

Cheap Repository.

THE PILGRIMS.

AN ALLEGORY.

SOLD BY J. & C. EVANS,

(Printers to the CHEAP REPOSITORY for Moral and Religious Tracts) Long-lane, Smithfield: and also by J. HATCHARD & SON, Piccadilly: J. NISBET, 21, Berners Street, Oxford Street, London; A. E. BINNS, Bath; and by all Booksellers and Hawkers in Town and Country.

GREAT ALLOWANCE WILL BE MADE TO SHOPKEEPERS AND HAWKERS.

Price One Penny, or Seven Shillings per Hundred.

Entered at Stationers' Hall.

THE PILGRIMS.

METHOUGHT I was once upon a time travelling through a certain land, which was very full of people, but what was rather odd, not one of all this multitude was at home; they were all bound to a far distant country. Though it was permitted by the Lord of the land that these Pilgrims might associate together for their present mutual comfort and convenience, and each was not only allowed, but commanded, to do the others all the services he could upon their journey; yet it was decreed, that every individual traveller must enter the far country singly. There was a great gulf at the end of the journey, which every one must pass alone, and at his own risk; and the friendship of the whole united world could be of no use in shooting that gulf. The exact time when each was to pass, was not known to any; this the Lord always kept a close secret out of kindness, yet still they were as sure that the time must come, and that at no very great distance, as if they had been informed of the very moment. Now, as they knew they were always liable to be called away at an hour's notice, one would have thought they would have been chiefly employed in packing up, and preparing, and getting every thing in order. Not they indeed. It was almost the only thing which they did not think about.

Now I only appeal to you, my readers, if any of you are setting out upon a little common journey, if it is only to London or York, is not all your leisure time employed in settling your business at home, and packing up every little necessary for your expedition? And does not the fear of neglecting any thing you ought to remember, or may have occasion for, haunt your mind, and sometimes even intrude upon you unseasonably? And when you are actually on your journey, especially if you have never been to that place before, or are likely to remain there, don't you begin to think a little about the pleasures and the employments of the place, and to wish to know a little what sort of a city London or York is? Don't you wonder what is doing there, and whether you are properly qualified for the business or the company you expect to be engaged in? Do you never look at the Map, or consult Brookes's Gazetteer? And don't you try to pick up from your fellow-passengers in the stage-coach, any little information you can get? And though you may be obliged, out of civility, to converse with them on common subjects, yet do not your secret thoughts still run upon London or York, its business or its pleasures? And, above all, if you are likely to set out early, are you not afraid of over-sleeping? and does not that fear keep you upon the watch, so that you are commonly up and ready before the porter comes to summon you?—Reader! if this be your case, how surprised will you be to hear, that the travellers to the far country have not half your prudence, though bound on a journey of infinitely more importance, to a land where nothing can be sent after them; and which, when they are once settled, all errors are irretrievable.

I observed that these Pilgrims, instead of being upon the watch lest they should be ordered off unprepared; instead of laying up any provision, or even making memorandums of what they would be likely to want, spent most of their time in crowds, either in the way of traffic or diversion. At first, when I saw them so much engaged in conversing with each other, I thought it a good sign, and listened attentively to their talk, not doubting but the chief turn of it would be about the climate, or treasures, or society they should probably meet with in the far country. I supposed they might be also discussing about the best and safest road to it, and that each was availing himself of the knowledge of his neighbour, on a subject of equal importance to all. I listened to every party, but in scarcely any did I hear one word about the land to which they were bound, though it was their home, the place where their whole interest, expectation, and inheritance lay; to which also great part of their friends were gone before, and whither they were sure all the rest would follow. Instead of this, their whole talk was about the business, or the pleasures, or the fashions, of the strange country which they were merely passing through, and in which they had not one foot of land which they were sure of calling their own for the next quarter of an hour. What little estate they had was personal, and not real; and that was a mortgaged, life-hold tenement of clay, not properly their own, but only lent to them on a short uncertain lease, of which threescore years and ten was considered as the longest period, and very few indeed lived in it to the end of the term; for this was always at the will of the Lord, part of whose prerogative it was, that he could take away the lease at pleasure, knock down the stoutest inhabitant at a single blow, and turn out the poor shivering helpless tenant, naked, to that far country for which he had made no provision. Sometimes, in order to quicken the Pilgrim in his preparation, the Lord would break down the tenement by slow degrees; sometimes he would let it tumble by its own natural decay; for as it was only built to last a certain term, it would sometimes grow so uncomfortable by increasing dilapidations, even before the ordinary lease was out, that the lodging was hardly worth keeping, though the tenant could seldom be persuaded to think so, but fondly clung to it to the last. First the thatch on the top of the tenement changed colour; then it fell off and left the roof bare; then "the grinders ceased because they were few;" then the windows became so darkened, that the owner could scarcely see through them; then one prop fell away, then another: then the uprights became bent, and the whole fabric trembled and tottered, with every other symptom of a falling house. On some occasions the Lord ordered his messengers (of which he had a great variety) to batter, injure, deface, and almost demolish the frail building even while it seemed new and strong: this was what the landlord called giving warning; but many a tenant would not take warning, and was so fond of staying where he was, even under all these inconveniences, that at last he was cast out by ejection, not being prevailed on to leave his dwelling in a proper manner, though one would have thought the fear of being turned out would have whetted his diligence in preparing for a better and a more enduring inheritance. For though the people were only tenants at will in these crazy tenements, yet, through the goodness of the same Lord, they were assured that he never turned them out of these habitations, before he had on his part provided for them a better; so that there was not such another landlord in the world; and though their present dwelling was but frail, being only slightly run up to serve the occasion, yet they might hold their future possession by a most certain tenure, the word of the Lord himself, which was entered in a covenant, or title-deed, consisting of many sheets; and because a great many good things were given away in this deed, a book was made, of which every soul might get a copy. This indeed had not always been the case; because, till a few ages back, there had been a sort of monopoly in the case, and "the wise and prudent," that is, the cunning and fraudulent, had hid these things from the "babes and sucklings," that is, from the low and ignorant; and many frauds had been practised, and the poor had been cheated of their right; so that not being allowed to read and judge for themselves, they had been sadly imposed upon; but all these tricks had been put an end to more than two hundred years, when I passed through the country, and the meanest man who could read, might then have a copy, so that he might see himself what he had to trust to; and even those who could not read, might hear it read once or twice every week at least, without pay, by learned men, whose business it was. But it surprised me to see how few comparatively, made use of these vast advantages. Of those who had a copy, many laid it carelessly by, expressed a general belief in the truth of the title-deed; a general satisfaction that they should come in for a share of the inheritance; a general good opinion of the Lord whose word it was, and a general disposition to take his promise upon trust; always, however, intending, at a convenient season, to enquire farther into the matter. But this convenient season seldom came; and this neglect of theirs, was construed into a forfeiture of the inheritance.

At the end of this country lay the vast gulf mentioned before; it was shadowed over by a broad and thick cloud which prevented the Pilgrims from seeing in a distinct manner what was doing behind it, yet such beams of brightness now and then darted through the cloud, as enabled those who used a telescope provided for that purpose, to see the substance of things hoped for; but it was not every one who could make use of this telescope; no eye, indeed, was naturally disposed to it; but an earnest desire of getting a glimpse of the invisible realities, gave such a strength and steadiness to the eye, as enabled it to discern many things which could not be seen by the natural sight. Above the cloud was this inscription:—The things which are seen are temporal ; but the things which are not seen are eternal. Of these last many glorious descriptions had been given ; but as those splendours were at a distance, and as the Pilgrims in general did not care to use the telescope, these distant glances made little impression. The glorious inheritance which lay beyond the cloud, was called the things above—while a multitude of trifling objects, which appeared contemptibly small when looked at through the telescope, were called the things below. Now as we know it is nearness which gives size and bulk to any object, it was not wonderful that these ill-judging Pilgrims were more struck with these baubles and trifles (which by lying close at hand, were visible and tempting to the naked eye, and which made up the sum of things below) than with the remote glories of the things above : but this was chiefly owing to their not making use of the telescope, through which, if you examined thoroughly the things below, they seemed to shrink almost down to nothing, while the things above appeared the more beautiful and vast the more the telescope was used. But the surprising part of the story was this—not that the Pilgrims were captivated at first sight with the things below (for that was natural enough), but that when they had tried them all over and over, and found themselves deceived and disappointed in almost every one of them, it did not at all lessen their fondness, and they grasped at them again with the same eagerness as before. There were some gay fruits which looked alluring, but on being opened, instead of a kernel, they were found to contain rottenness ; and those which seemed the fullest, often proved, on trial, to be quite hollow and empty. Those which were most tempting to the eye, were often found to be wormwood to the taste, or poison to the stomach ; and many flowers that seemed most bright and gay, had a worm gnawing at the root.

Among the chief attractions of the things below, were certain little lumps of yellow clay, on which almost every eye and every heart was fixed. When I saw the variety of uses to which this clay could be converted, and the respect which was shewn to those who could scrape together the greatest number of pieces, I did not much wonder at the general desire to pick up some of them. But when I beheld the anxiety, the wakefulness, the competitions, the contrivances, the tricks, the frauds, the scuffling, the pushing, the turmoiling, the kicking, the shoving, the cheating, the circumvention, the envy, the malignity, which was excited by a desire to possess this article; when I saw the general scramble among those who had little to get much; and of those who had much, to get more—then I could not help applying to these people a proverb in use among us, that gold may be bought too dear.—Though I saw that there were various sorts of baubles which engaged the hearts of different travellers, such as an ell of red or blue ribbon, for which some were content to forfeit their future inheritance, the sin of Esau without his temptation of hunger; yet the yellow clay, I found, was the grand object for which most hands scrambled, and most souls were risked. One thing was extraordinary, that the nearer these people were to being turned out of their tenement, the fonder they grew of these pieces of clay; so that I naturally concluded they meant to take the clay with them to the far country; but I soon learnt this clay was not current there, the Lord having declared to these Pilgrims, that as they had brought nothing into this world, they could carry nothing out.

I enquired of the different people who were raising the various heaps of clay, some of a larger, some of a smaller size, why they discovered such unremitting anxiety, and for whom? Some, whose piles were immense, told me they were heaping up for their children: this I thought very right, till on casting my eyes round, I observed many of the children of these very people had large heaps of their own. Others told me it was for their grandchildren; but on enquiry I found these were not yet born, and in many cases there was little chance they ever would. The truth, on a close examination, proved to be, that the true genuine heapers really heaped for themselves; that it was, in fact, neither for friend or child, but to gratify an inordinate appetite of their own. Nor was I much surprised after this to see these yellow hoards at length canker, and the rust of them become a witness against the hoarders, and eat their flesh as it were fire.

Many, however, who had set out with a high heap of their father's raising, before they had got one third of their journey, had scarcely a single piece left. As I was wondering what had caused these enormous piles to vanish in so short a time, I spied, scattered up and down the country, all sorts of odd inventions, for some or other of which the vain possessors of the great heaps of clay had trucked and bartered them away in fewer hours than their ancestors had spent years in getting them together. O what a strange unaccountable medley it was! and, what was ridiculous enough, I observed that the greatest quantity of the clay was always exchanged for things that were of no use that I could discover; owing, I suppose, to my ignorance of the manners of that country.

In one place I saw large heaps exhausted in order to set two idle pampered horses a running; but the worst part of the joke was, the horses did not run to fetch or carry any thing, but merely to let the gazers see which could run the fastest—Now this gift of swiftness, exercised to no one useful purpose, was only one out of many instances I observed of talent used to no end. In another place I saw whole piles of the clay spent to maintain long ranges of buildings full of dogs, on provisions which would have nicely fattened some thousands of Pilgrims, who sadly wanted fattening, and whose ragged tenements were out at elbows, for want of a little help to repair them. Some of the piles were regularly pulled down once in seven years, in order to corrupt certain needy Pilgrims to belie their consciences. Others were spent in playing with white stiff bits of paper, painted over with red and black spots; in which I thought there must be some conjuring, because the very touch of these painted pasteboards made the heaps fly from one to another, and back again to the same, in a way that natural causes could not account for. There was another proof that there must be some magic in this business, which was, that if a pasteboard with red spots fell into a hand which wanted a black one, the person changed colour—his eyes flashed fire—and he discovered other symptoms of madness, which shewed there was some witchcraft in the case.—These clean little pasteboards, as harmless as they looked, had the wonderful power of pulling down the highest piles, in less time than all the other causes put together.—I observed that many small piles were given in exchange for an enchanted liquor, which, when the purchaser had drank to a little excess, he lost all power of managing the rest of his heap, without losing the love of it.

Now I found it was the opinion of sober Pilgrims, that either boarding the clay or trucking it for any such purposes as the above, was thought exactly the same offence in the eyes of the Lord; and it was expected that when they should come under his more immediate jurisdiction, in the far country, the penalty annexed to hoarding and squandering, would be nearly the same. While I examined the countenances of the owners of the heaps, I observed that those who I well knew never intended to make any use at all of their heap, were far more terrified at the thought of losing it, or of being torn from it, than those were, who were employing in in the most useful manner. Those who best knew what to do with it, set their hearts least upon it, and were always most willing to leave it.—But such riddles were common in this odd country.

Now I wondered why these Pilgrims, who were naturally made erect, with an eye formed to look up to the things above, yet had their eyes almost constantly bent in the other direction, rivetted to the earth, and fastened on things below, just like those animals who walk on all-fours. I was told they had not always been subject to this weakness of sight and proneness to earth; that they had originally been upright and beautiful, having been created after the image of the Lord, who was himself the perfection of beauty; that he had at first placed them in a far superior situation, which he had given them in perpetuity; but that their first ancestors fell from it through pride and carelessness; that upon this the freehold was taken away, they lost their original strength, brightness, and beauty, and were driven into this strange country, where, however, they had every opportunity given them of recovering their health, and the Lord's favour and likeness ; for they were become so disfigured, and were grown so unlike him, that you would hardly believe they were his own children ; though in some the resemblance was become again visible. The Lord, however, was so merciful, that instead of giving them up to the dreadful consequences of their own folly, as he might have done without any impeachment of his justice, that he gave them immediate comfort ; and promised them, that in due time his own Son should come down and restore them to the future inheritance, which he should purchase for them. And now it was that, in order to keep up their spirits, after they had lost their estate through the folly of their ancestors, that he began to give them a part of their former title-deed. He continued to send them portions of it from time to time, by different faithful servants, whom, however, these ungrateful people, generally used ill, and some of whom they murdered. But for all this, the Lord was so very forgiving, that he at length sent these mutineers a proclamation of full and free pardon, by his Son ; who, though they used him in a more cruel manner than they had done any of his servants, yet after having finished the work his Father had given him to do, went back into the far country to prepare a place for all them who believe in him ; and there he still lives, begging and pleading for those unkind people, whom he still loves and forgives, and will restore to the purchased inheritance, on the easy terms of their being heartily sorry for what they had done ; thoroughly desirous of pardon ; and convinced that he is able and willing to save to the utmost, all them that come unto him.

I saw, indeed, that many old offenders appeared to be sorry for what they had done ; that is, they did not like to be punished for it. They were willing enough to be delivered from the penalty of their sin, but they did not heartily wish to be delivered from the power of it. Many declared, in the most public manner, once every week, that they were very sorry they had done amiss ; that they had erred and strayed like lost sheep ;—but it was not enough to declare their sorrow ever so often, if they gave no other sign of their penitence. For there was so little truth in them, that the Lord required other proofs of their sincerity beside their own word ; for they often lied with their lips, and dissembled with their tongue. But those who professed to be penitents, were neither allowed to raise heaps of clay, by circumventing their neighbours, or to keep great piles lying by them useless; nor must they barter them for any of those idle vanities which reduced the heaps on a sudden: for I found that, among the grand articles of future reckoning, the use they had made of the heaps would be a principal one.

I was sorry to observe many of the fairer part of these Pilgrims spend too much of their heaps in adorning and beautifying their tenements of clay; in painting, white-washing, and enamelling them. All those tricks, however, did not preserve them from decay; and when they grew old, they even looked worse for all this cost and varnish. Some, however, acted a more sensible part, and spent no more upon their mouldering tenements than just to keep them whole and clean, and in good repair, which is what every tenant ought to do; and I observed that those who were moderate in the care of their own tenements, were most attentive to repair and warm the ragged tenements of others. But none did this with much zeal or acceptance, but those who had acquired a habit of overlooking the things below, and who also by the constant use of the telescope, had got their natural weak and dim sight so strengthened, as to be able to discern pretty distinctly the nature of the things above. The habit of fixing their eyes on these glories, made all the shining trifles, which compose the mass of things below, at last appear in their own diminutive littleness. For it was in this case particularly true, that things are only big or little by comparison; and there was no other way of making the things below appear as small as they really were, but by comparing them, by means of the telescope, with the things above. But I observed that the false judgment of the Pilgrims ever kept pace with their wrong practices; for those who kept their eyes fastened on the things below, were reckoned wise in their generation—while the few who looked forward to the future glories, were accounted by the bustlers or heapers, to be either fools or mad.

Well—most of these Pilgrims went on in adorning their tenements, adding to their heaps, grasping the things below as if they would never let them go, shutting their eyes instead of using their telescope, and neglecting their title-deed as if it was the parchment of another man's estate, and not their own; till one after another, each felt his tenement tumbling about his ears. Oh! then what a busy, bustling, anxious, terrifying, distracting moment was that! what a deal of business was to be done, and what a strange time was this to do it in! Now to see the confusion and dismay occasioned by having left every thing to the last minute. First some one was sent for to make over the yellow heaps to another, which the heaper now found would be of no use to himself in shooting the gulf—a transfer which ought to have been made while the tenement was sound. Then there was a consultation between two or three masons at once, perhaps to try to patch up the walls, and strengthen the props, and stop the decays of the tumbling tenement; but not till the masons were forced to declare it was past repairing (a truth they were rather too apt to keep back) did the tenant seriously think it was time to pack up, prepare, and be gone. Then what sending for the wise men who professed to explain the title-deed; and Oh, what remorse that they had neglected to examine it till their senses were too confused for so weighty a business! What reproaches, or what exhortations to others, to look better after their own affairs!—Even to the wisest of the inhabitants, the falling of their tenements was a solemn thing; solemn, but not surprising: they had long been packing up and preparing: they praised their Lord's goodness that they had been suffered to stay so long. Many acknowledged the mercy of their frequent warnings, and confessed that those very dilapidations which had made the house uncomfortable, had been a blessing, as it had set them on diligent preparation for their future inheritance; had made them more earnest in examining their title to it; and had set them on such a frequent application to the telescope, that the things above had seemed every day to approach nearer and nearer. These desired not to be uncloathed, but to be cloathed upon; for they knew that if their frail tabernacle was dissolved, they had an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Z.

THE END.