To sufferers from Catarrh, the Spring is an important season; for it is then that by reason of the system being debilitated by the cold of winter, and by its resistance to the changes of temperature incident to that season, the disease becomes seated in incipient cases, and more firmly established where it is already chronic; but more important even than this is its inroads upon the general health at that time of the year. The disease is one of the upper air passages, having direct connection through the bronchial tubes with the lungs below. Where there is a predisposition to bronchial troubles or lung weakness, these are aggravated by the presence of Catarrh, and all physicians know that the Spring is the season when this class of troubles are most fatal. Again, the Catarrhal discharges are constantly finding their way into the stomach, producing nausea, disarranging digestion, and inducing dyspepsia of a chronic form. A long experience in the treatment of this special complaint has demonstrated to us that in the Spring of the year, when the physical functions are in a relaxed state, and the temperature is neither cold nor hot, the disease is more rapidly amenable to a suitable and scientific treatment.

That our method of treating Catarrh is the most successful one before the public to-day, is abundantly testified to by its great popularity, and by the letters received daily at our office from its grateful patrons.

Observe.—Our remedy is easily applied—it is used only once in twelve days, and its application does not interfere with business or ordinary duties. We give every case our special attention.
