GULLIVER'S TRAVELS

were written by Dean Swift; they are stories of people and places which all belong to the kingdom of "Make-believe," as Fairy Tales do.

Gulliver (the book tells us) was a doctor, who went to sea in a ship called the "Antelope." He was wrecked in a great storm, but managed to swim on shore, and landed in the country of Lilliput, the people of which were as small as fairies, being only as tall as Gulliver's little finger was long. But when the poor man landed he did not know where he was, and being tired, fell asleep on the grass. When he awoke, he found himself fastened to the earth by numbers of tiny threads, while the little people were walking all over him!

These tiny men, however, were not unkind, though they kept Gulliver prisoner for a little while. Their Emperor would not let anyone hurt him, and once, when six wicked little men shot arrows at his face, he gave them to Gulliver to punish. But the kind Englishman would not hurt them; he put five in his coat pocket, and frightened the last by pretending that he was going to eat him up. Then, when the mannikin begged for mercy, he set him safely on the ground and let the others out of his pocket. The Emperor was glad to see that the "Man-mountain," as they called Gulliver, was good and kind, and from that time he was treated well by the little people, who fed him and took care of him.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS.

At last, after many adventures, Gulliver found an empty boat on the sea, and in it managed to escape to an English ship, in which he returned to London.

Some time afterwards Gulliver went to sea again. A storm once more blew the ship out of her right course, and they reached the country of the Giants, called "Brobdingnag." Here Gulliver, who had landed with some sailors to get water, was accidentally left on shore, and found himself in a field of wheat, the stalks of which were forty feet high. He lay down amongst it, and was picked up by a reaper, who carried him to the farmer as a curious animal. This giant carried Gulliver home on his hand, and gave him to his little daughter Glumdaclitch for a plaything. Gulliver seemed as small to these people as the Lilliputians had appeared to him. He was shown about as a curiosity, till at last the Queen bought him of the farmer, and he lived at court. His little nurse was kept to take care of him. The pictures will show you how he lived amongst these giants, who were very kind, good people.

At last an eagle carried away the box in which he was kept,—it was a kind of large doll's house,—by the handle, and dropped it in the sea. It was found by an English ship; Gulliver was taken from it, and once more carried safely home to England.
