ARGUMENT OF "ROBESPIERRE"

ROBESPIERRE'S RISE.—The revolutionary spirit, which a long course of misgovernment had engendered, had fairly broken out, and from the Assembly of the States General a series of momentous events mark the ever increasing violence of its onward progress. Chief among these may be mentioned the fall of the Bastille (July 14); the abolition of seigneurages; the death of Mirabeau (1791); the flight of the King (June 2, 1791); the taking of the Tuilleries; the enthronement and imprisonment of the King, followed by the establishment of the Republic (1792) and the execution of the King in the following January. Two great parties are now rivals for the supreme power in the State—the Girondins, or Moderate Republicans, called the Plain, from their filling the body of the Chamber; and the Jacobins, or Red Republicans, called the Mountain, from the raised benches which they occupied. In the ensuing struggle the Jacobins proved victorious, and the leaders of the Girondins were executed (June 2). Henceforth Marat, Danton and Robespierre were omnipotent, and inaugurated the Reign of Terror. But dissensions and intrigues soon disintegrated the party. Danton is accused and condemned of reactionary designs at the instance of Robespierre; and at this point the action of M. Sordou's play commences. Robespierre, now virtually dictator, and resolved to sweep all opposition from his path, passes his notorious Law of Prairial, which made possible the hideous judicial massacres of the Terror; whilst nearly concurrently, and as a counter-demonstration to the declared atheism of a handful of his adherents, he claims the sanction of the Convention to a religious festival, at which he himself officiates as High Priest of the Supreme Being, whose existence is formally recognized. But jealousy and intrigue were slowly undermining his authority.

ROBESPIERRE'S FALL.—The functions of government were at this time discharged by three distinct bodies, all of them equally responsible for the horrors of the Terror, and pledged to prolong its sanguinary rule. We have in the first place, the Convention, a representative body, corresponding in the main to the House of Commons; secondly, the Committee of Public and General Security, elected by the Convention from their own body, and forming a species of permanent Cabinet with unlimited powers; and thirdly, the Jacobin Club, Robespierre's stronghold, which was, in fact, an irresponsible association, but all-important as the focus and mouthpiece of the rabid radicalism in Paris. At the opening of the play Robespierre is still all-powerful; but the atrocities perpetrated under his dictatorship have started a reaction which grows apace, and the infection gradually reaches some of Robespierre's disciples, who perceiving the altered current of public opinion, determine to abandon their chief, and compass his destruction. On the 10th Thermidor, the majority of the Mountain, including some whose hands were most deeply dyed with the blood shed during the Terror, triumphed, with the assistance of the Moderates in the Convention, over their widowed leader, and secured his overthrow and execution. But the alliance was fatal to their own consistency. The Convention henceforth resumed its powers; it had surrendered; law regained its authority, and the Terrorists were finally crushed by the very instrument which they had called to their assistance.
