INTRODUCTION

MANY young Readers doubtless remember to have met with a Book, which gives an account of a little boy, named Henry, and his fifter Charlotte, who were indulged, by their Mamma, with walking in the fields and gardens, where she taught them to take particular notice of every object that presented itself to their view. The consequence of this was, that they contracted a great fondiness for Animals; and used often to express a wish, that their Birds, Cats, Dogs, &c. could talk, that they might hold conversation with them. Their Mamma, therefore, to amuse them, composed the following Fabulous Histories; in which the A. 5 Sentiments fentiments and affections of a good Father and Mother, and a Family of Children, are supposed to be possessed by a Nest of Redbreasts: and others of the feathered race are, by the force of imagination, endued with the same faculties: but, before Henry and Charlotte began to read these Histories, they were taught to consider them, not as containing the real conversations of Birds, (for that it is impossible we should ever understand,) but as a series of FABLES, intended to convey moral instruction applicable to themselves, at the same time that they excite compassion and tenderness for those interesting and delightful creatures, on which such wanton cruelties are frequently inflicted, and recommend universal Benevolence.

Having given this account of the origin of the following little Work, the Author will no longer detain her young Readers from the perusal.

rusal of it, as she flatters herself, they will find ample instruction, respecting the proper treatment of Animals, in the course of her Fabulous Histories, which now invite their attention.

Fabulous Histories.

CHAP. I

IN a hole, which time had made, in a wall covered with ivy, a pair of RED-BREASTS built their neft. No place could have been better chosen for the purpose ; it was sheltered from the rain, skreened from the wind, and in an orchard belonging to a Gentleman, who had strictly charged his domesticks not to destroy the labours of those little songsters, which chose his ground as an afylum.

In this happy retreat, which no idle school-boy dared to enter, the lien Redbreast deposited four eggs, and then took her feat upon them; refolving, that nothing should tempt her to leave the nest, till she had hatched her infant brood. Her tender mate every morning brought her food, before he tafted any himfelf, and then cheered her with a long,

At length the day arrived, when the hap py mother heard the chirping of her little ones; pleafing to her ears, as the prattle of a beloved child to its fond parent: with inexpressible tenderness she spread her maternal wings to cover them, threw out the egg-shells in which they before lay confined, then pressed them to her mate, who viewed them with rapture, and seated himself by her side, that he might share her pleasure.

We may promise ourselves much delight in rearing our little family, faid he, but it will occasion us a great deal of trouble; I would willingly bear the whole fatigue myfelf, but it will be impossible for me, with the utmost labour and industry, to supply all our nestlings with what is sufficient for their daily support; it will therefore be necessary for you, to leave the nest occasionally, in order fometimes to feek provisions for them. She declared her readiness to take a flight whenever it should be requisite; and faid, that there would be no necessity for her to be long absent, as she had in her last excursion discovered a place near the orchard, where food was scattered on purpose for such birds as would take the pains of feeking it; and had been informed by a . Chaffingh Chassinch, that there was no kind of danger in picking it up. This is a lucky discovery indeed, replied he, and we must avail ourfelves of it; for this great increase of family renders it prudent to make use of every expedient for supplying our necessities; I myself, must take a larger circuit, for some insects that are proper for the neftlings cannot be found in all places: however, I will bear you company whenever it is in my power. The little ones now began to feel the sensation of hunger, and opened their gaping mouths for food; on which, their kind father instantly flew forth to feek it for them, and in turns sup plied them all, as well as his beloved mate, This was a hard day's work; and when evening came on, he was glad to feek repose; therefore, turning his head under his wing, he foon fell afleep; his mate followed his example; the four little ones had before fallen into a gentle flumber, and perfect quietness for some hours reigned in the nest.

The next morning they were awakened at the dawn of day, by the fong of a Skylark, who had a nest near the orchard; and as the young Redbreasts were clamorous for food, their father cheerfully prepared himself to renew his toil, but first requested his mate to accompany him to the place ffie had mentioned. That I will do, replied fhe, at a proper hour, but it is too early yet; I must, therefore, entreat that you will go by yourself, and procure a breakfast for us, as I am fearful of leaving the neftlings before the air is warmer, left they should be chilled. To this he readily confented, and fed all his little darlings, to whom, for the fake of distinction, I shall give the names of Robin, Dicky, Flapfy, and Peckfy. When this kind office was performed, he perched on an adjacent tree, and there, while he rested, entertained his family with his melody, till his mate springing from the nest, called on him to attend her; on which he instantly took wing, and followed her to a court-yard, belonging to an elegant manfion.

No fooner did they appear before the parlour window, than it was haftily thrown up by Miss Harriet Benson, a little girl about eleven years old, the daughter of the Gentleman and Lady to whom the house belonged.

Miss Harriet, with great delight, called her brother to see two Robin Redbreasts: Her summons was instantly complied with, and she was joined by Master Frederick, a fine chubby rosy-cheeked boy, about six years years of age, who, as foon as he had taken a peep at the feathered strangers, ran to his mamma, and entreated her to give him fomething to feed the birds with. I must have a great piece of bread this morning, faid he, for there are all the Sparrows and Chaffinches that come every day, and two Robin Redbreafts besides. Here is a piece for you, Frederick, replied Mrs. Benfon, cutting a roll that was on the table; but if your daily penfioners continue to increase, as they have done lately, we must provide fome other food for them, as it is not right to cut pieces from a loaf on purpose for birds, because there are many children that want bread, to whom we should give the preference. Would you deprive a poor little hungry boy of his breakfast, to give it to birds? No, said Frederick, I would fooner give my own breakfast to a poor boy, than he should go without. But where shall I get victuals enough for my birds? I will beg the cook to fave all the crumbs in the bread-pan, and defire John to preferve all he makes, when he cuts the loaf for dinner, and those which are scattered on the table-cloth. A very good scheme, said Mrs. Benson, and I advise you, my dear, to put it in execution; for I make no doubt it will answer your purpurpose, if you can prevail on the servants to indulge you. I cannot bear to see the least fragment of food wasted, which may conduce to the support of life in any creature.

Miss Harriet being quite impatient to exercise her benevolence, requested her brother to remember that the poor birds, for whom he had been a successful solicitor, would soon sly away, if he did not make haste to feed them; on which he ran to the window with his treasure in his hand.

When Miss Harriet first appeared, the winged suppliants approached with eager expectation of the daily handful, which their kind benefactress made it a custom to distribute, and were furprized at the delay of her charity, They hopped around the window—they chirped—they twittered, and employed all their little arts to gain attention; and were on the point of departing, when Master Frederick, breaking a bit from the piece he held in his hand, attempted to featter it amongst them, calling out at the same time, Dicky! Dicky! On hearing the well-known found of invitation, the little flock immediately drew near-Master Frederick held a short contest with his sister, in order to prevail with her to let him feed all the birds himfelf; but but finding that he could not fling the crumbs far enough for the Redbreafts, who, with the timidity of strangers, kept at a distance, he resigned the task, and Miss Harriet, with dexterous hand, threw some of them to the very spot where the affectionate pair flood, waiting for an opportunity of attracting her notice, and with grateful hearts picked up the portion affigned them, and in the mean while, the other birds having fatisfied their hunger, fucceffively withdrew, and they were left alone. Mafter Frederick exclaimed with rapture, that the two Robin Redbreafts were feeding! and Miss Harriet meditated a design of taming them, by repeated inftances of kindness. Be fure, my dear brother, faid she, not to forget to alk the cook and John for the crumbs; and do not let the least little morsel of any thing you have to eat, fall to the ground. I will be careful in respect to mine, and we will collect all that papa and mamma crumble; and if we cannot by these means: get enough, I will spend some of my money in feed for them. O, faid Frederick, I would give all the money I have in the world to buy victuals for my dear, dear birds. Hold, my love, faid Mrs. Benfon, though I commend your humanity, I must remind you again, that there are poor people ple as well as poor birds.—Well, mamma, replied Frederick, I will only buy a little feed them. As he spake the last words, the Redbreasts having simished their meal, the mother-bird expressed her impatience to return to the nest: and having obtained her mate's consent, repaired with all possible speed to her humble habitation, whilst he tuned his melodious pipe, and delighted their young benefactors with his music; he then soared into the air, and took his slight to an adjoining garden, where he had a great chance of finding worms for his family.

CHAP. II.

MASTER BENSON expressed great concern that the Robins were gone; but was comforted by his sister, who reminded him, that in all probability his new favourites, having met with so kind a reception, would return on the morrow. Mrs. Benson then bid them shut the window, and taking Frederick in her lap, and desiring Miss Harriet to sit down by her; thus addressed them.

I am delighted, my dear children, with your humane behaviour towards the animal creation, and wish by all means to encourage it. But though a most commendable propensity, it requires regulation; let me therefore recommend to you, not to suffer it to gain upon you to such a degree, as to make you unhappy, or forgetful of those, who have a superior claim to your attention: I mean poor people; always keep in mind the distresses which they endure, and on no account waste any kind of food, nor give to inferior animals what is designed for mankind.

Miss Harriet promised to follow her mamma's instruction's; but Frederick's attention was entirely engaged by watching a Butterfly, which had just left the chryfalis, and was fluttering in the window, longing to try its wings in the air and fun-This Frederick was very desirous of catching, but his mamma would not permit him to attempt it; because (she told him) he could not well lay hold of its wings without doing it an injury, and it would be much happier at liberty. Should you like, Frederick, faid fhe, when you are going out to play, to have any body lay hold on you violently, fcratch you all over, then offer you fomething to est which is very disagreeable, And yet this is the fate to which many an harmless insect is condemned by thought-less children. As soon as Frederick understood that he could not catch the Buttersly without hurting it, he gave up the point, and assured his mamma, he did not want to keep it, but only to carry it out of doors. Well, replied she, that end may be answered by opening the window, which at her desire was done by Miss Harriet; the happy insect seised the opportunity of escaping, and Frederick had soon the pleasure of seeing it in a rose-tree.

Breakfast being ended, Mrs. Benson reminded the young lady and gentleman, that it was almost time for their lessons to begin; but desired their maid to take them into the garden before they applied to business, whilst she gave some directions in the samily; and Master Frederick, during his walk, amused himself with watching the Butterfly, as it slew from slower to slower, which gave more pleasure than he could possibly have received from catching and confining the little tender creature.

Let us now see what became of our Redbreasts, after they left their young benefactors.

The

The hen bird, as I informed you, repaired immediately to the nest; her heart fluttered with apprehension as she entered it, and she eagerly called out, " Are you all safe my little dears?" All safe, my good mother, replied Peckfy, but a little hungry, and very cold. Well, faid she, your last complaint I can soon remove; but in respect to satisfying your hunger, that must be your father's task, for I have not been able to bring any thing good for you to eat; however, he will foon be here, I make no doubt. Then fpreading her wings over them all, she soon communicated warmth to them, and they were again comfortable. In a very short time her mate returned, for he only staid at Mr. Benson's to finish his fong, and refresh himself with fome clear water, which his new friends always kept in the place where they fed the birds, on purpose for their little pen-He brought in his mouth a worm, which was given to Robin; and was going to fetch one for Dicky, but that his mate reminded him of their agreement, to divide betwixt them the care of providing for the family. My young ones are now hatched, faid she, and you can keep them warm as well as myfelf; take my place, therefore, and the next excursion shall be mine. I content, confent, answered he, with the more pleafure, because I think a little flying now and then will do you good; but to fave you the trouble of a painful fearch, I can direct you to a spot, where you may be certain of finding worms enow for this morning's supply. He then described the place; and immediately on her quitting the nest entered it, and gathered his young ones under his wings.—Come, my dears, faid he, let us fee what kind of a nurse I can make; but an aukward one, I fear; even every mother-bird is not a good nurse: but you are very fortunate in your's, for the is an exceeding tender one, and I hope you will make her a dutiful return for her kindness. They all promised him they would: well, then, faid he, I will fing you a fong. He did fo, and it was a very merry one, and delighted the neftlings extremely; fo that though they laid a little inconveniently under his wings, they did not regard it, nor think the time of their mother's absence long; she had not succeeded in the place she first went to, as a boy was picking up worms to angle with, of whom she was afraid, and therefore slew farther: but as foon as the obtained what The went for, the returned with all possible speed; and notwithstanding she had repeated

peated invitations from feveral gay birds which she met, to join their sportive parties, she kept a steady course, preserring the pleasure of feeding little Dicky, to all the diversions of the fields and groves. As soon as she came near the nest, her mate started up to make room for her, and take his turn of providing for his family. Once more adieu! said he, and was out of fight in an instant.

Well, my neftlings, faid the mother, how do you do? Very well, thank you, replied all at once; and we have been very merry, faid Robin, for my father has fung us a fweet fong. I think, faid Dicky, I should like to learn it. Well, replied the mother, he will teach it you, I dare fay: here he comes, ask him. I am ashamed, faid Dicky. Then you are a filly bird, replied she. Never be ashamed, but when you commit a fault: asking your father to teach you to fing, is not one; and good parents delight to teach their young ones every thing that is proper and useful. Whatever to good a father fets you an example of, you may fafely defire to imitate. Then addressing herself to her mate, who for an instant stopped at the entrance of the nest, that he might not interrupt her instructions, Am I not right, faid she, in what I have

I shall have pleasure in teaching them all that is in my power; but we must talk of that another time. Who is to feed poor Pecksy? Oh! I, I, answered the mother, and was gone in an instant. And so you want to learn to sing, Dicky? said the father. Well then, I will repeat my song, so pray listen very attentively; you may learn the notes, though you will not be able to practise them till your voice is stronger. He then sung with the same approbation as before.

Robin now remarked, that it was very pretty indeed, and expressed his desire to learn it also. By all means, said his father, I shall sing it very often, so you may learn it if you please. For my part, said Flapsy, I do not think I could have patience to learn it, it will take fo much time.-Nothing, my dear Flapfy, answered the father, can be acquired without patience, and I am forry to find your's begin to fail you already: But I hope, if you have no taste for mulic, that you will give the greater application to things that may be of more importance to you. Well, faid Peckfy, I would apply to music with all my heart, but I do not believe it possible for me to attain Perhaps not, replied her father, but I do not doubt your application to whatever your mother requires of you, and she is an excellent judge both of your talents, and of what is fuitable to your station in life. She is no fongster herself, and yet she is very clever, I assure you. Here she comes. Then rifing to make room for her, take your feat, my love, faid he, and I will perch upon the ivy. The hen again covered her brood, whilft her mate amused her with his finging and conversation, till evening reminded them of repose; excepting, that each made alternate excursions, as the appetites of their young ones required.

In this manner feveral days passed with little variation, the neftlings were very thriving, and daily gained strength and knowledge, through the care and attention of their indulgent parents, who every day vilited their friends, Mafter and Mils Benfon. Frederick had been successful in his application to both the cook and footman, by whose affistance he obtained enough for his dear birds, as he called them, without infringing on the rights of the poor; and he was still able to produce a halfpenny, whenever his papa or mamma pointed out to him a proper object of Charity.

CHAP, III.

TT happened one day, that both the Redbreafts, who always went together to Mr. Benson's (because, if one had waited for the other's return, it would have miffed the chance of being fed) it happened, I fay, that they were both absent longer than usual, for their little benefactors having been fatigued with a very long walk the evening before, lay late in bed that morning; but as foon as Frederick was dreffed, his fifter, who was waiting for him, took him by the hand, and led him down stairs, where he haftily demanded of the cook the collection of crumbs referved for him. As foon as he entered the breakfast parlour, he ran eggerly to the window, and atof this mighty buftle? faid his mamma. Do you not perceive that I am in the room, Frederick? Oh, my birds! my birds! cried he. I understand, rejoined Mrs. Benfon, that you have neglected to feed your little penfioners; how came this about, Harriet? We were so tired last night, answered Miss Benson, that we overslept ourselves, mamma. This excuse may satisfy you and your your brother, added the Lady, but I fear your birds would bring heavy complaints against you, were they able to talk our language. But make hafte to supply their prefent wants; and for the future, whenever you give any living creature cause to depend on you for sustenance, be careful on no account to disappoint it; and if you are prevented feeding it yourfeif, employ another person to do it for you. But though it is very commendable, and indeed an obligation on our humanity, to be attentive to your dependants, yet you must not let this make you forgetful of your duty to your friends. It is cultomary for little boys and girls to pay their respects to their papa's and mamma's every morning, as foon as they fee This, Frederick, you ought to have done to me, on entering the parlour, instead of tearing across it, crying out, my birds! my birds! It would have taken you but a very little time to have done fo: however, I will excuse your neglect now, my dear, as you did not intend to offend me; but I expect that you will fo manage the bufinessyou have undertaken, that it may not break in on your higher obligations. You depend as much on your papa and me, for every thing you want, as these little birds do on B 3 you?

you: nay, more so, for they could supply their own wants, by feeking food in other places; but children can do nothing towards their support: therefore it is particularly requifite, that they should be dutiful and respectful to those, whose tenderness and care are constantly exerted for their benefit. Miss Harriet promised her mamma, that she would, on all occasions, endeavour to behave as she wished her to do; but I am forry to fay, Frederick was more intent on opening the window, than on imbibing the good instructions that were given him: this he could not effect, and therefore Harriet, by her mamma's permission, went to his assistance, and the store of provisions was dispensed. As many of the birds had nests, they eat their meal with all possible expedition; amongst this number were the Robins, who dispatched this bufiness as focn as they could, for the hen was anxious to return to her little ones, and the cock to procure them a breakfast; and having given his young friends a ferenade, before they left their bed-chambers, he did not think it necessary to stay to sing any more, they therefore departed. When the mother-bird arrived at the ivy wall, she flopt at the entrance of the nest, with a palpitating heart; but feeing her brood all fafe and well, the haftened to take them under her wings. As foon as the was feated, the observed that they were not so cheerful as usual. What is the matter? said she, How have you agreed during my absence? To these questions all were unwilling to reply, for the truth was, that they had been quarrelling almost the whole time. What, all silent? said she; I fear you have not obeyed my commands, but have been contending. I desire you will tell me the truth. Robin, knowing that he was the greatest offender, began to justify himself, before the others could have time to lay an accusation against him.

I am fure, mother, faid he, I only gave Dicky a little peck, because he crowded me so; and all the others joined with him, and fell upon me at once.

Since you have begun, Robin, answered Dicky, I must speak, for you gave me a very hard peck indeed, and I was assaid you had put out my eye. I am sure I made all the room I could for you; but you said you ought to have half the nest, and to be master, when your father and mother were out, because you are the eldest.

I do not love to tell tales, faid Flapfy, but what Dicky fays is very true, Robin; and you plucked two or three little feat thers out of me, only because I begged you not to use us ill.

And you set your foot very hard upon me, cried Pecksy, for telling you that you had forgot your dear mother's injunction.

This is a fad flory indeed, faid the mother. I am very forry to find, Robin, that you already discover such a turbulent dispolition. If you go on in this manner, we shall have no peace in the nest, nor can I leave it with any degree of fatisfaction. As for your being the eldest, though it makes me shew you a preference on all proper occasions, it does not give you a privilege to domineer over your brother and fifters. You are all equally the objects of our tender care, which we shall exercise equally amongst you, provided you do not forfeit it by bad behaviour. To shew you that you are not master of the nest, I defire you to get from under my wing, and fit on the outfide, whilst I cherish those who are dutiful and good. Robin, greatly mortified, retired from his mother; on which Dicky, with the utmost kindness, began tointercede for him. Pardon Robin, my dear mother, I entreat you, faid he, I heartily forgive his treatment of me, and would not have complained to you, had it not been necessary for my own justification.

tion. You are a good bird, Dicky, faid his mother, but fuch an offence as this must be repented of before it is pardoned. this instant her mate returned with a fine worm, and looked as usual for Robin, who lay skulking by himself. Give it, said the mother, to Dicky, Robin must be served last this morning; nay, I do not know whether I shall permit him to have any victuals all day. Dicky was very unwilling to mortify his brother, but on his mother's commanding him not to detain his father, he opened his mouth and swallowed the delicious mouthful. What can be the matter, faid the good father, when he had emptied his mouth, furely none of the little ones have been naughty? But I cannot stop to enquire at present, for I lest another fine worm, which may be gone if I do not make haste back.

As foon as he departed, Dicky renewed his folicitations that Robin might be forgiven; but as he fat swelling with anger and disdain, because he fancied that the eldest should not be shoved to the outside of his mother's wing, whilst the others were sed, she would not hear a word in his behalf. The father soon came and fed Flapsy, and then, thinking it best for his mate to continue her instructions, he made another excursion; during which, Pecksy, whose little heart was full of affectionate concerns for the punishment of her brother, thus attempted to comfort him.

Dear Robin, do not grieve, I will give you my breakfast, if my mother will let me. O, said Robin, I do not want any breakfast; if I may not be served first, I will have none. Shall I ask my mother to forgive you? I don't want any of your intercessions, replied he; if you had not been a parcel of ill-natured things, I should not Ifave been pushed about as I am.

Come back, Peckfy, faid the mother, who overheard them, I will not have you hold converse with so naughty a bird. I forbid every one of you even to go near him. The father then arrived, and Peckfy was fed. You may rest yourself, my dear; faid the mother, your morning's task is ended. Why, what has Robin done? asked he. What I am forry to relate, she replied: Quarrelled with his brother and fifters. Quarrelled with his brother and fifters! you furprize me: I could not have fusible cted he would have been either so foolish or so unkind .- O, this is not all, faid the mother, for he prefumes on being the eldest, and claims half the nest to himfelf when we are absent, and now is fullen, because because he is disgraced, and not fed first as usual. If that is the case, replied the sather, leave me to settle this business, my dear, and pray go into the air a little, for you seem to be sadly agitated. I am disturbed, said she, I confess; for after all my care and solicitude, I did not expect such a sad recompense as this. I am forry to expose this perverse bird, even to you, but he results my efforts to reform him. I will do as you desire, go into the air a little; so saying, she repaired to a neighbouring tree, where she waited, with anxious expectation, the event of her mate's interposition.

As soon as the mother departed, the father thus addressed the delinquent. And so, Robin, you want to be master of the nest? A pretty master you will make indeed, who do not know even how to govern your own temper! I will not stand to talk much to you now, because, in your present disposition, you would in all probability turn a deaf ear to my admonitions; but depend upon it, I will not suffer you to use any of the samily ill, particularly your good mother; and if you persist in obstinacy, I will certainly turn you out of the nest before you can sly. These threatenings intimidated Robin, and he also began to be very hungey, as well as cold; he therefore promifed to behave better for the future, and his brother and fifters pleaded earnestly that he might be forgiven and restored to his usual place. I can fay nothing in respect to the last particular, replied the father, that depends upon his mother; but as it is his first offence, and he feems to be very forry, I will myfelf pardon it, and intercede for him with his mother, who I fear is at this time lamenting his obduracy. On this he left the nest to seek for her. Return, my dear, faid he, to your beloved family; Robin feems fenfible of his offence, and longs to alk your forgiveness. Pleased at this intelligence, the mother raifed her drooping head, and closed her wings, which hung mournfully by her fides, expressive of the dejection of her spirits. I sly to give it him, faid she, and hastened into the nest. In the mean while Robin wished for, yet dreaded her return. As foon as he faw. her, he lifted up a supplicating eye, and with feeble accents (for hunger concurred with forrow to make him faint) he chirped, " Forgive me, dear mother, I will not again offend you." I accept your submisfion, Robin, faid she, and will once more receive you to my wing; but indeed your bena-behaviour has made me very unhappy. She then made room for him, he neftled closely to her side, and soon found the benefit of her fostering heat; but the pain of hunger still remained, yet he had not confidence to ask his father to fetch him any victuals: but this kind parent waited not for folicitation, for feeing that his mother had received him into favour, he went with all speed to an adjacent field, where he soon met with refreshment for him, which with tender love he presented, and Robin swallowed with gratitude. Thus was peace reflored to the nest, and the happy mother once more rejoiced that harmony reigned in the family.

C.H.A.P. IV.

A Few days after, a fresh disturbance took place. All the little Redbreasts, excepting Pecksy, in turn committed some sault or other, for which they were occasionally punished; but she was of so amiable a disposition, that it was her constant study to act with propriety, and avoid giving offence; on which account the was justly careffed by her parents with a greater degree of kindness. This exeited the envy of the others, and they joined together to treat her ill, giving her the title of the Favourite; faying, that they made no doubt their father and mother would referve the nicest morsels for their darling. Poor Peckfy bore all their reproaches with patience, hoping that she should in time regain their good opinion by her gentleness and affection. But it happened one day, that in the midst of their tauntings their mother unexpectedly returned, who hearing an uncommon noise among her young ones, stopped on the ivy to learn the cause; and as soon as she discovered it, made her appearance at the entrance of the nest, with a countenance that indicated her knowledge of their proceedings, and her displeasure at them. Are these the sentiments, faid she, that subsist in a family, which ought to be bound together by love and kindness? Which of you has cause to reproach either your father or me with partiality? Do we not, with the exacteft equality, distribute the fruits of our labours among you? And in what respect has poor Peckfy the preference, but in that commendation which is justly her due, and which you do not strive to deserve? Has she ever. y.et yet uttered a complaint against you, though, from the dejection of her countenance, which she in vain attempted to conceal, it is evident that she has suffered your reproaches for some days past. I positively command you to treat her otherwise, for it is a mother's duty to succour a persecuted nestling; and I will certainly admit her next my heart, and banish you all from that place you have hitherto possessed in it; if you suffer envy and jealousy to possess your bosoms, to the exclusion of that tender love which she, as the kindest of sisters;

has a right to expect from you.

Robin, Dicky, and Flapfy, were quita confounded at their mother's surprizing them in the midst of their naughty behaviour, and Pecksy selt an affectionate concern that they had incurred the displeasure of so tender a parent; and far from increasing it by complaining of them, endeavoured to sosten her anger. That I have been vexed, my dear mother, said she, is true, but not to as great a degree as you suppose; and I am ready to believe, that my dear brothers and sister were not in earnest in the severe things they said of me.—Perhaps they only meant to try my affections.—To spare them the trouble of lieve my assurances, that I would willingly resign the greatest pleasure in life, could I by that means increase their happiness; and so far from wishing for the nicest morsel, I would content myself with the humblest fare, rather than any of them should be disappointed. This tender speech had its desired effect; it recalled those sentiments of love, which envy and jealousy had for a time banished; each nessling acknowledged its fault, and having obtained the forgiveness of their mother, a perfect reconciliation took place, to the great joy of Pecksy, and indeed of all parties.

All the neftlings continued very good for several days, and no occurrence happened worth relating; the little slock were soon covered with feathers, which their mother taught them to dress, telling them, that neatness was a very essential thing, being conducive to health, and also to render them agreeable in the eye of the world.

Robin was a very strong robust bird, not remarkable for his beauty, but there was a great briskness in his manner, which covered many defects, and he was very likely to attract notice. His father judged, from the tone of his chirpings, that he would be a very good songster.

Dicky

Dicky had a remarkably fine plumage, his breast was of a beautiful red, his body and wings of an elegant mottled brown, and his eyes sparkled like diamonds.

Flapfy was also very pretty, but more distinguished for the elegance of her shape, than for the variety and lustre of her feathers.

Peckfy had no outward charms to recommend her to notice; but these desects were amply supplied by the sweetness of her disposition, which was amiable to the greatest degree. Her temper was constantly serene, she was ever attentive to the happiness of her parents, and would not have grieved them for the world; and her affection for her brothers and sister was so great, that she constantly preferred their interest to her own, of which we lately gave an instance.

The kind parents attended to them with unremitting affection, and made their daily visit to Maiter and Miss Benson, who very punctually discharged the benevolent office of seeding them. The Robin Redbreasts, samiliarized by repeated savours, approached nearer and nearer to their little friends by degrees, and at length ventured to enter the room and feed upon the breakfast-table. Miss Harriet was delighted at this circumstance, stance, and Frederick was quite transported; he longed to catch the birds, but his mamma told him, that would be the very mean to drive them away. Miss Harriet entreated him not to frighten them on any account, and he was prevailed on to forbear; but could not help expressing a wish that he had them in a cage, that he might feed them all day long.

And do you really think, Frederick, faid Mrs. Benson, that these little delicate creatures are fuch gluttons, as to defire to be fed all day long? Could you tempt them to do it, they would foon die; but they know better, and as foon as their appetites are fatisfied, always leave off eating. Many a little boy may learn a lesson from them: Do not you recollect one of your acquaintance, who, if an apple-pie, or any thing else that he calls nice, is set before him, will eat till he makes himself sick? Frederick looked ashamed, being conscious that he was too much inclined to indulge his love of delicacies. Well, faid his mamma, I fee you understand who I mean, Frederick, fo we will fay no more on that fubject; only, when you meet with that little Gentleman, give my love to him, and tell him I beg he will be as moderate as his Redbreafts.

The cock bird having finished his breakfast, flew out at the window, followed by his mate; and as foon as they were out of fight, Mrs. Benson continued her discourse. And would you really confine these sweet creatures in a cage, Frederick, merely to have the pleasure of looking at them? Should you like to be always that up in a little room, and think it sufficient if you were supplied with victuals, and drink? Is there no enjoyment in running about, jumping, and going from place to place ? Do not you like to affociate with little boys and girls? And is there no pleasure in breathing the fresh air? Though these little animals are inferior to you, there is no doubt but they are capable of enjoyments fimilar to these; and it must be a dreadful life for a poor bird to be shut up in a cage, where he cannot fo much as make use of his wings-where he is excluded from his natural companions-and where he cannot possibly receive that refreshment, which the air must afford to him when at liberty to foar to fuch a height. But this is not all, for many a poor bird is caught, and feparated from its family, after it has been at the trouble of building a nest-has perhaps laid its eggs-or even hatched its young ones, which are by this means means exposed to inevitable destruction? It is likely that these very Redbreasts may have young ones, for this is the season of the year for their hatching; and I rather think they have, from the circumstance of their always coming together. If that is the case, said Miss Harriet, it would be pity indeed to confine them. -But why, mamma, if it is wrong to catch birds, did you at one time keep Canaries? The cafe is very different in respect to Canaries, my dear, faid Mrs. Benson. By keeping them in a cage, I do them a kindness. I confider them as little foreigners who claim my hospitality. This kind of bird came originally from a warm' climate, they arein their nature very susceptible of cold, and would perish in the open air in our winters: neither does the food which they feed on grow plentifully in this country; and as they are always here bred in cages, they do not know how to procure the materials for their nests abroad. And there is another particular which would greatly diffress them were they to be turned loofe, which is, the ridicule and contempt they would be exposed to from other birds. I remember once to have feen a poor Canary, which had been turned loofe because it could not sing; and furely no creature could be more mifefamishing with thirst, shivering with cold, and looked terrified to the greatest degree; whilst a parcel of Sparrows and Chassinches pursued it from place to place, twittering and chirping with every mark of infolence and derision. I could not help fancying the little creature to be like a foreigner just landed from some distant country, followed by a rude rabble of boys, who were ridiculing him, because his dress and language were ftrange to them.

And what became of the poor little creature, mamma? faid Miss Harriet. I was going to tell you, my dear, replied Mrs. Benson. I ordered the servant to bring me a cage, with feed and water in their usual places; this I caused to be hung on a tree, next to that in which the little sufferer in vain endeavoured to hide himself amongst the leaves from his cruel purfuers. No fooner did the fervant retire, than the poor little wretch flew to it. I immediately had the cage brought into the parlour, where I experienced great pleasure in observing what happiness the poor creature enjoyed in her deliverance. I kept it some years, but not chusing to confine her in a little cage, had a large one bought, bought, and procured a companion for her of her own species. I supplied them with materials for building, and from them proceeded a little colony, which grew fo numerous, that you know I gave them to Mr. F. to put in his aviary, where you have feen them enjoying themselves. So now I hope I have fully accounted for having kept Canary birds in a cage. You have indeed, mamma, faid Harriet. I have also, faid Mrs. Benson, occasionally kept Larks. In fevere winters vast numbers of them come to this country from a colder climate, and many perish. Quantities of them are killed and fold for the spit, and the bird-catchers usually have a great many to fell, and many an idle boy has some to dispose of. I frequently buy them, as you know, Harriet, but as foon as the fine weather returns, I constantly set them at liberty. But come, my dears, prepare for your morning walk, and afterwards let me see you in my dressing-room.

I wonder, said Frederick, whether our Redbreasts have got a nest? I will watch to-morrow which way they sly, for I should like to see the little ones. And what will you do should you find them out? said his mamma. Not take the nest, I hope? Why, replied Frederick, I should like to bring bring it home, mamma, and put it in a tree near the house, and then I would scatter crumbs for the old ones to feed them with. Your defign is a kind one, faid Mrs. Benfen, but would greatly distress your little favourites. Many birds, through fear, forfake their nests, when they are removed, therefore I defire you to let them alone if you should chance to find them. Miss Harriet then remarked, that she thought it very cruel to take birds nefts. Ah! my dear, faid Mrs. Benson, those who commit such barbarous actions, are quite infensible to the distresses they occasion. It is very true, that we ought not to indulge so great a degree of pity and tenderness for such animals, as for those who are more properly our fellow-creatures; I mean men, women, and children; but as every living creature can feel, we should have a constant regard to those feelings, and strive to give happiness, rather than inflict mifery. But go, my dear, and take your walk. Mrs. Benfon then left them, to attend her usual morning employments; and the young Lady and Gentleman, attended by their maid, paffed an agreeable half hour in the garden.

CHAP. V.

IN the mean time, the hen Redbreaft re-L turned to the nest, whilst her mate took his flight in fearch of food for his family. When the mother approached the nest, she was furprized at not hearing as usual the chirping of her young ones; and what was her aftonishment at seeing them all crouded together, trembling with apprehension! What is the matter, my neftlings, faid she, that I find you in this terror?—Oh, my dear mother! faid Robin, who first ventured to raise up his head, is it you? Peckfy then revived, and entreated her mother to come into the nest, which she did without delay, and the little tremblers crept under her wings, endeavouring to conceal themselves in this happy retreat. What has terrified you in this manner? faid she. Oh! I do not know, replied Dicky, but we have feen fuch a monster as I never beheld before. A monster, my dear? pray describe it. I cannot, said Dicky, it was too frightful to be described. Frightful, indeed, cried Robin, but I had a full view of it, and will give the best description I can. We were all lying peaceably in the nest, and very happy together; I and Dicky were trying to fing, when fuddenly we heard a noise against the wall, and presently a great round red face appeared before the nest, with a pair of enormous staring eyes, a very large beak, and below that a wide mouth, with two rows of bones, that looked as if they could grind us all to pieces in an instant. About the top of this round face, and down the fides, hung fomething black, but not like feathers. When the two staring eyes had looked at us for fome time, the whole thing difappeared. I cannot at all conceive, from your description, Robin, what this thing could be, faid the mother, but perhaps it may come again. Oh! I hope not, cried Flapfy, I shall die with fear if it does. Why fo, my love? faid her mother, has it done you any harm? I cannot fay it has, replied Flapfy. Well then, you do very wrong, my dear, in giving way to fuch apprehensions. You must strive to get the better of that fearful disposition. When you go abroad in the world, you will fee many strange objects; and if you are terrified at every appearance which you cannot account for, you will live a most unhappy life. Endeavour to be good, and then you need not fear any thing. But here comes YOUT

Four father, perhaps he will be able to exp'ain the appearance which has so alarmed you to-day. As foon as the father had given the worm to Robin, he was preparing to depart for another, but to his furprize, all the rest of the nestlings begged him to stay, declaring, that they had rather go without their meal, on condition he would but remain at home and take care of them. Stay at home and take care of you! faid he. Why is that more necessary now than usual? The mother then related the strange occurrence that had occafioned this request. Nonsense, said hea monfter !- great eyes !- large mouth !long beak !—I don't understand fuch stuff. -Besides, as it did them no harm, why are they to be in fuch terror now it is gone? Don't be angry, dear father, said Peckfy, for it was very frightful indeed. Well, faid he, I will fly all round the orchard, and perhaps may meet this monster. Oh! it will eat vou up! it will eat you up! said Flapfy. Never fear, faid he, and away he flew. The mother then again attempted to calm them, but all in vain, their fears were now redoubled by apprehensions for their father's fafety; however, to their great joy, he scon returned. Well, said he, I have feen this monster; the little ones then then clung to their mother, fearing the dreadful creature was just at hand. What, afraid again! cried he; a parcel of flout hearts I have in my nest truly! Why, when you fly about in the world you will, in all probability, fee hundreds of fuch monsters, (as you call them) unless you chuse to confine yourselves to a retired life; nay, even in woods and groves you will be liable to meet feme of them, and those of the most mischievous kind. I begin to comprehend, faid the mother, that these dear nestlings have seen the face a Even so, replied her mate; it is our friend the gardener who has fo alarmed A MAN! cried Dicky, was that frightful thing a man? Nothing more, I affure you, answered his father, and a good man too, I have reason to believe; for he is very careful not to frighten your mother and me, when we are picking up worms, and has frequently thrown crumbs to us, when he was eating his breakfast. And does he live in this garden? faid Flapfy. He works here very often, replied her father, but is frequently absent. O then, cried she, pray take us abroad when he is away, for indeed I cannot bear to fee him. You are a little simpleton, said the sather; and if you do not endeavour to get morerefoluresolution, I will leave you in the nest by yourself, when I am teaching your brothers and sisters to fly and peck, and what will you do then? for you must not expect we shall go from them to bring you sood. Flapsy, fearful that her father would be guite angry, promised to follow his directions in every respect, and the rest, animated by his discourse, began to recover their spirits.

passed in the nest, the monster, who was no other than honest Joe the gardener, went to the house, and enquired for his young master and mistress, having, as he justly supposed, a very pleasing piece of intelligence to communicate. Both the young gentleman and lady, who were accustomed to receive little civilities from Joe, very readily attended him, thinking he had got some fruit or flowers for them. Well, Joe, said Miss Benson, what have you to say to us? Have you got a peach or a nectarine? or have you brought me a root root of Sweet William? No, Miss Harriet, faid Joe, but I have fomething to tell you, that will please you as much as though I had. What's that? what's that? cried Why master Frederick, said Joe, a pair of Robins have come'd mortal often to one place in the orchard lately; fo, thinks I, these birds have got a nest. So, I watches, and watches, and at last I fee'd the old hen fly into a hole in the ivy-wall. I had a fancy to fet my ladder and look in, but as master ordered me not to frighten the birds, I staid till the old one flew out again, and then I mounted, and there I fee'd the little creatures full fledged; and if you and Miss Harriet may go with me, I will shew them? to you, for the nest is but a little way from the ground, and you may eafily get up the step-ladder. Frederick was in raptures, being confident that these were the identical Robins he was so attached to, and (like a little thoughtless boy as he was) would have gone immediately with the gardener. had not his fifter reminded him, that it was proper to alk mamma's leave first, for which purpose she accompanied him into the parlour. Good news! good news! mamma, cried Frederick, Joe has found the Robins nest. Has he indeed? faid Mrs. Benson. Yes, mamma, faid Miss Harriet, and if agreeagreeable to you, we should be glad to go along with Joe to fee it. And how are you to get at it, faid Mrs. Benson, for I suppose it is some height from the ground? Oh, I can climb a ladder very well, cried Frederick. You climb a ladder? You are a clever gentleman at climbing, I know, replied his mamma; but do you propole to mount too, Harriet? I think this rather an indelicate scheme for a lady. Joe tells me that the nest is a very little way from the ground, mamma, answered Harriet, but if I find it otherwise, you may depend on my not getting up. On this condition I will permit you to go; but pray, Mr. Frederick, let me remind you, not to frighten your little savourites. Not for all the world, faid Frederick; away he skipped, and got to Joe before his fifter. We may go! we may go! Joe, cried he. Stay for me, Joe, I beg, faid Miss Harriet, who presently joined him.

When the Redbreasts had quieted the sears of their young samily, they sed them as usual, and then, having a little private business, they retired to a tree, desiring their nestlings not to be terrified if the monster should look in upon them again, as it was very probable he would do.

They

They promised to bear the fight as well as they could.

When the old ones were feated in the free, it is time, faid the father, to take our neftlings abroad. You fee, my love, how very timorous they are, and if we do not use them a little to the world, they will never be able to shift for themselves. Ve y true, replied the mother, they are now full fledged, and therefore, if you pleafe, we will take them out to-morrow; but it will be necessary for me to prepare them for it, I will therefore return to the nest. One of the best preparatives, answered her mate, will be to leave them by themselves a little; therefore we will now take a flight together for a fhort time, and then go back. The mother complied, but not without reluctance, for the longed to be with her dear family. Let us now return to the happy party, whom we lately left fetting off on their visit to the ivy-wall.

CHAP. VII.

As foon as Joe found, that the young gentry, as he called them, had obtained permission to accompany him, her took Frederick by the hand, and faid, come along, my young mafter, but at Miss Harrjet's request, stopped while she fetched her connet and tippet. Frederick's impatience was so great, that he could fearcely be re-Arained from running all the way, but that his lifter entreated him not to make himfelf too hot. At length they arrived at the defired fpot; Joe placed the ladder, and his young mafter, with a little affiftance, mounted it very dexteroufly: But who can describe his raptures when he beheld the neftlings! Oh! the fweet creatures, cried he, there are four of them, I declare! I never faw any thing fo pretty in my life! I wish I might carry you all home! That you must not do, Frederick, said his sister; and I beg you will come away, for you will either terrify the little creatures, or alarm the old birds, which perhaps are now waiting somewhere near to feed them. Well, I will come away directly, faid Frederick, and fo good by, Robins! I hope you will come foon, along with your father and mother, to be fed in the parlour. He then, under the conduct of his friend Joe, descended. Joe next addressed Miss Harriet: Now, my young insferess, said he, will you go up? As the steps of the ladder were broad, and the nest was not high, Miss Benson ventured to go up, and was equally delighted with her brother; but so fearful of terrifying the little birds, and alarming the old ones, that she would only indulge herself with a peep at the nest. Frederick enquired how the liked the young Robins? They are sweet creatures, said she, and I hope we shall foon find means to invite them to join our party of birds, for they appear to me ready to fly; but let us return to mamma, for you know we promifed her to stay but a little while; besides, we hinder Joe from his work. Never mind that, faid the honest fellow, master won't be angry, I am fartain; and if I thought he would, I would work an hour later to fetch up lost time. Thank you, Joe, replied Miss Harriet, but I am sure papa would not defire that. At this inflant Frederick perceived the two Redbreasts, who were returning from their proposed excurfion, and called to his fifter to observe them. He was very defirous to wa ch whether whether they would return to their nest, but she would on no account consent to stay, lest her mamma should be displeased, and lest the birds should be frightened: Frederick, therefore, with reluctance sollowed her, and Joe attended them to the liouse.

As foon as they were out of fight, the hen-bird proposed to return to the nest; The had observed the party, and though she did not fee them looking into her habitation, supposed, from their being so near, that they had been taking a view of it, and communicated her fuspicions to her mate. He agreed with her, that this had probably been the case, and said he now expected to hear a fine story from the nestlings. Let us return, however, faid the mother, for perhaps they have been terrified again. Well, faid he, I will attend you then; but let me caution you, my dear, not to indulge their fearful dispositions, because such indulgence will certainly prove injurious to them. I will do the best I can, replied fhe, and then flew to the neft, followed by her mate. She alighted upon the ivy, and peeping into the nest, enquired how they all did? Very well, dear mother, faid Re-What, cried the father, (who now alighted) all fafe? Not one eat up by the moniter?

monster? No, father, replied Dicky, we are not devoured, and yet, I affure you, the monster we saw yesterday has been here again, and brought two others with him. Two others! what, like himfelf? faid the father: I thought, Flapfy, you were to die with apprehention if you faw him again? And fo I believe I should have done, had not you, my good father, instructed me to conquer my fears, replied Flapfy. When I saw the top of him, my heart began to flutter to fuch a degree, that I was ready to faint, and every feather of me shook; but when I found he staid but a very little while, I recovered, and was in hopes he was quite gone. My brothers and fifter, I believe, felt as I did; but we comforted one another that the danger was over for this day, and all agreed to make ourselves happy, and not fear this monster, fince you had affured us he was very harmlefs. However, before we were perfectly come to ourselves, we heard very uncommon noises, sometimes a hoarse sound, disagreeable to our ears as the croaking of a raven, and fometimes a shriller noise, quite unlike the note of any bird that we know of, and immediately after fomething prefented itfelf to our view, which bore a little refemblance to the monfter, but by no means-10.

to large and frightful. Instead of being all over red, it had on each fide two spots of a more beautiful hue than Dicky's breast, the rest of it was of a most delicate white, excepting two streaks of a deep red, like the cherry you brought us the other day, and between these two streaks were rows of white bones, but by no means dreadful to behold, like those of the great mon-Iter; its eyes were blue and white, and round this agreeable face was fomething which I cannot describe, very pretty, and as gloffy as the feathers of a Goldfinch. There was fo cheerful and pleasing a look in this creature altogether, that notwithstanding I own I was rather afraid, yet I had pleafure in looking at it, but it flaid a very little time and then disappeared. Whilst we were puzzling ourselves with conjectures concerning it, another creature, larger than it, appeared before us, equally beautiful, and with an aspect so mild and gentle, that we were all charmed with it; but, as if fearful of alarming us by its flay, it immediately retired, and we have been longing for your and my mother's return, in hopes you would be able to tell us what we have feen.

I am happy, my dears, faid the mother, to find you more composed than I expected;

pected; for as your father and I were fiving together in order to come back to you, we observed the monster, and the two pretty creatures Peckfy has described; the former is, as your father before informed you, our friend the gardener, and the others are our young benefactors, by whose bounty we are every day regaled, and who, I will venture to fay, will do you no harm. You cannot think how kindly they treat us; and though there are a number of other birds who share their goodness, your father and I are favoured with their particular regard. Oh, faid Peckfy, are these sweet creatures your friends? I long to go abroad that I may fee them again. Well, cried Flapfy, I perceive, that if we judge from appearances we may often be mistaken; who would have thought that fuch an ugly monster as that gardener, could have had a tender heart? Very true, replied the mother; you must make it a rule, Flapfy; to judge of mankind by their actions, and not by their looks. I have known some of them, whose appearance was as engaging as that of our young benefactors, who were, notwithstanding, barbarous enough to take eggs out of a nest and spoil them; nay, even carry away nest and all before the young ones were fledged, without knowing FOW

how to feed them, or having any regard to the forrows of the tender parents. Yes, said the mother, last year it was my misfortune to be deprived o my nestlings in that manner, which occasions my being so timid; the anguish I suffered for their loss is not to be expressed.

A calamity of the same kind befel me, replied the father, I never shall forget it. I had been making an excursion into the woods, in order to procure fome deliciousmorfels for one of my neftlings; when I returned to the place in which I had imprudently built, (for being young and inexperienced, I did not foresee the danger of chusing an exposed situation,) the first circumstance that alarmed me, was a part of my nest scattered upon the ground, just at the entrance of my habitation; I then perceived a large opening in the wall, where before there was only room for myself to pass. I stopped with a palpitating heart, in hopes of hearing the chirpings of my beloved family; but all was filence. I then resolved to enter; but what was my consternation, when I found that the nest. which my dear mate and I had with fo much labour built, and the dear little ones. who were the joy of our lives, were taken away; nay, I did not know but that the tender immediately rushed out of the place, distracted with apprehensions of the miseries they might endure; lamented my weakness, which rendered me incapable of effecting their rescue; was ready to tear off my own feathers with vexation; but recollecting that my dear mate might in all probability have escaped, I resolved to go in fearch of her. As I was slying along, I saw three boys, whose appearance was far from disagreeable; one of them held in his hand my nest of young ones, which he eyed with cruel exultation, whilst his companions feemed to share his joy.

My dear little creatures, infensible of their fate, (for they were newly hatched). opened their mouths in expectation of the usual supply, but all in vain; to have attempted feeding them at this time, would have been inevitable destruction to myfelf; but I resolved to follow the barbarians, that I might at least see to what place my darlings were configned. In a fhort time the party arrived at a house, and he who before held the nest, now committed it to the care of another, but foon returned with a kind of victuals I was totally unacquainted with; and with this my young ones, when they gaped for food; were fuccessively fed: hunger hunger induced them to swallow it with avidity, but soon after missing the warmth of their mother, they set up a general chirp of lamentation, which pierced my very heart. Immediately after this the nest was carried away, and what became of my nestlings afterwards I never could discover, though I frequently hovered about the fatal spot of their imprisonment, with the hope of seeing them.

Pray, father, faid Dicky, what became of your mate? Why, my dear, faid he, when I found there was no chance of affifting my little ones, I purfued my course, and fought her in every place of our usual refort, but to no purpose: At length I returned to the bush, where I beheld an afflicting fight indeed, my dear companion Iying on the ground, just expiring! I flew to her inflantly, and endeavoured to recalher to life: At the found of my voice, the lifted up her languid eye-lids, and with feeble accents faid, And are you then fate, my love? What is become of our little ones? In hopes of comforting her, I told her they were alive and well; but the replied, your confolations come too late; the blow is struck, I feel my death approaching. The horror which seized me when I miffed my neftlings, and supposed myself robbed robbed at once of my mate and infants, was too powerful for my weak frame to fuftain. Oh! why will the human race be for wantonly cruel! The agonies of death now came on, and after a few convultive pangs, flie breathed her last, and left me an unhappy widower. I paffed the remainder of the fummer, and a dreary winter that fucceeded it, in a very uncomfortable manner; though the natural cheerfulness of my disposition, did not leave me long a prey to unavailing forrow: and having paid a proper tribute to the memory of my first dear mate, I refolved the following fpring to feek another; and had the good fortune to meet with one, whose amiable disposition has renewed my former happiness: and now, my dear, faid he, let me ask you what became of your former companion? Why, replied the hen Redbreaft, foon after the loss of our nest, as he was endeavouring to discover what was become of it, a cruel hawk caught him up, and devoured him in an instant.

I need not fay that I felt the bitterest pangs for his loss; it is sufficient to inform you, that I led a folitary life, till I met with you, whose endearing behaviour has made society again agreeable to me.

Whilst the parent birds were thus relating the history of their past misfortunes, the young ones liftened with the greatest attention; and when the tales were ended, Flapfy exclaimed, Oh! what dangers there are in the world! I shall be afraid to leave the nest. Why so, my love? faid the mother. Every bird does not meet with Hawks and eruel children. You have already, as you fat on the nest, seen thousands of the feathered race, of one kind or other, making their airy excursions, full of mirth and gaie ty. This orchard constantly resounds with the melody of those who chaunt forth their fongs of joy, and I believe there are no beings in the world happier than birds, for we are naturally formed for cheerfulness; and I flatter myself, a prudent precaution will preserve both your father and myself from any future accident. Our parents were young and unexperienced themselves, and did not give us good advice; but we know the dangers of the world, and I hope shall be able to point out to you such rules of conduct, as may, if followed, counteract the usual accidents to which birds are exposed. Instead of indulging your fears, Flapfy, faid the father, fummon up alt your courage, for to-morrow you shall, with your brothers and fifter, begin to fee the the world. Dicky expressed great delight at this declaration, and Robin boasted that he had not the least remains of fear. Flapfy, though still apprehensive of monsters, yet longed to see the gaieties of life, and Pecksy wished to comply with every desire of her dear parents. The approach of evening now reminded them that it was time to take repose, and turning their heads under their wings, each bird soon resigned itself to the gentle power of sleep.

had been gratified with the fight of the Robin's nest, they were returning to the house, conducted by their friend Joe, when they were met in the garden by their papa and mamma, accompanied by Miss Lucy Jenkins and her brother Edward. The former was a fine girl about ten years old, the latter a robust rude boy, turned of eleven. We were coming to seek you, my dears, said Mrs. Benson to her children, for I was fearful that the business you you went upon would make you forget your young visitors. I cannot answer for Frederick, replied Miss Benson, but indeed, my dear mamma, I would not on any account have flighted my friends. How do you do, my dear Miss Jenkins? said she, I am happy to see you. Will you go with me into the play-room? I have got, fome very pretty new books. Frederick, have you nothing to shew Master Jenkins? O yes, faid Frederick, I have got a new ball, a new top, a new organ, and twenty pretty things; but I had rather go back and shew him the Robins. The Robins! faid Master Jenkins, what Robins? Why our Robins, that have built in the ivy-wall. You never faw any thing fo pretty in your life as the little ones. Oh, I can fee birds enow at home, faid Master Jenkins; but why did you not take the neft? It would have been nice diversion to you to tofs the young birds about. I have had a great. many nelts this year, and do believe I have an hundred eggs. An hundred eggs! and how do you purpose to hatch them? said Miss Harriet, who turned back on hearing him talk in this manner. Hatch them, Miss Benson? said he; who ever thinks of hatching birds eggs? Oh, then you eat them, faid Frederick, or perhaps let your COOK

cook make puddings of them? No, indeed, replied Master Jenkins, I blow out the infide, and then run a thread through them, and give them to Lucy to hang up amongst her curiolities, and very pretty they look, I affure you. And fo, faid Miss Harriet, you had rather see a parcel of empty egg-shells, than hear a sweet concert of birds finging in the trees? I admire your tafte truly! Why, is there any harm in taking birds eggs? faid Miss Jenkins; I never before heard there was. My dear mamma, replied Miss Benson, has taught me to think, there is harm in every action which gives caufeless pain to any living creature; and I own I have a very particular affection for birds. Well, faid Miss Jenkins, I have no notion of fuch affections, for my part. Sometimes, indeed, I try to rear those which Edward brings home, but they are teazing troublesome things, and I am not lucky; to tell the truth, I do not concern myfelf much about them; if the live they live, and if they die they die. He has brought me three nests this day to plague me; I thought to have fed the birds before I came out, but being in a hurry to come to fee you, I quite forgot it. Did you feed them, Edward? tis enough for me to find the nefts. And have you actually left three nefts of young birds at home without victuals! exclaimed Miss Harriet. I did not think of them, but will feed them when I return, faid Miss Tenkins. Oh, cried Miss Benson, I cannot bear the thoughts of what the poor little creatures must suffer. Well, said Master Jenkins, since you feel so much for them, I think, Miss Harriet, you will make the best nurse. What say you, Lucy, will you give the nefts to Miss Benson? With all my heart, replied his fifter, and pray do not plague me with any more of them. I do not know that my mamma will let me accept them, faid Miss Benson, but if she will, I shall be glad to do fo. Frederick enquired what birds they were, and Master Tenkins informed him, there was a nest of Linnets, a nest of Sparrows, and another of Blackbirds. Frederick was all impatience to see them, and Miss Harriet longed to have the little creatures in her possession, that she might rescue them from their deplorable condition, and lessen the evils of captivity, which they now suffered in the extreme. Her mamma had left her with her young companion, that they might indulge themselves in innocent amusements without restraint, but the tender-der-hearted Harriet could not engage in any diversion, till she had made intercession in behalf of the poor birds; fhe therefore begged Miss Jenkins would accompany her to her mamma, in order to folicit permission to have the birds nests. She accordingly went, and made her request known to Mrs. Benson, who readily confented; observing, that though she had a very great objection to her children's having birds nefts, yet the could not deny her daughter on the present occasion. Harriet, from an unwillingness to expose her friend, had faid but little on the subject, -but Mrs. Benfon, having great discernment, concluded that she made the request from a merciful motive, and knowing that Miss Jenkins had no kind mamma to give ther instruction, she thus addressed her:

I perceive, my young friend, that Harriet is apprehensive the birds will not meet with the same kind treatment from you, which she is disposed to give them. I cannot think you have any cruelty in your nature, but perhaps you have only accustomed yourself to consider birds as playthings, without sense or feeling; to me, who am a great admirer of the beautiful little creatures, they appear in a very different light; and I have been an attentive observer observer of them, I assure you. Though they cannot speak our language, each kind has one of its own, which is perfectly understood by those of their own species; and fo far intelligible to us, as to convince us they are susceptible of joy, grief, fear, and ger and refentment; and we may eafily discover, that they delight in affociating with those of their own class, and pursue with alacrity the employments allotted them; from whence we may justly infer, that it is cruel to rob them of their young, deprive them of their liberty, separate them from their respective societies, or place them in fituations where they are excluded from the bleffings fuited to their natures, for which it is impossible for us to give them an equivalent. Besides, these creatures, infignificant as they appear in your estimation, were made by God as well as you. Have you not read in your Testament, my dear, that our Saviour faid, Bleffed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. How then can you expect that God will fend his bleffing upon you, if you, instead of endeavouring to imitate him in being merciful to the utmost of your power, are wantonly cruel to innocent creatures which he designed for happiness? This admonition from Mrs. Benfon, which Mifs Tenkins

Tenkins did not expect, made her look very ferious, and brought tears into her eyes; on which the good Lady took her by the hand and kindly faid, I wish not to distress you, my dear, but merely to awaken the natural fentiments of your heart: Reflect at your leifure on what I have taken the liberty of faying to you, and I am fure you will think me your friend. I knew your dear mamma, and can affure you, she was remarkable for the tenderness of her disposition. But let me not detain you from your amusements; go to your own apartment, Harriet, and use your best endeavours to make your vifitors happy. You cannot this evening fetch the birds, because, when Miss Jenkins goes, it will be too late for you to take fo long a walk, as you must come back afterwards; and I make no doubt, but that to oblige you, she will feed them to-night. Miss Harriet and Miss Jenkins returned, and sound Frederick diverting himself with the hand organ, which had lately been prefented by his god-papa; but Master Jenkins had laid hold of Miss Harriet's dog, and was searching his own pocket for a piece of string, that he might tie him and the cat together, to fee, as he faid, how nicely they would fight: and so fully was he bent on this cruel purpole, purpose, that it was with difficulty he could be prevailed on to relinquish it. Dear me! faid he, if ever I came into fuch a house in my life, there is no fun here. What would you have faid to Harry Pritchard and me, the other day, when we made the cats fly? Made cats fly! faid Frederick, how was that? Why, replied he, we tied bladders to each fide of their necks, and then flung them from the top of the house. There was an end of their purring and mewing for fome time, I affure you, for they lay a long while struggling and gasping for breath; and if they had not had nine lives, I think they must have died; but at last up they jumped, and away they ran scampering. Then out came little Jemmy, crying as if he had flown down himself, because we hurt the poor cats; he had a dog running after him, who, I suppose, meant to call us to task, with his bow, now; but we foon stopped his tongue, for we caught the gentleman and drove him I efore us into a narrow lane, and then ran I coting after him into the village; a numher of boys joined us, and cried out as we did, a mad dog! a mad dog! On this several people purfued him with cudgels and broomsticks, and at last he was shot by a span, but not dead, fo others came and knocked knocked him about the head till he expired. For shame! Master Jenkins, said Miss Harriet, how can you talk in that rhodomontade manner? I cannot believe any young Gentleman could bring his heart to fuch barbarities. Barbarities, indeed! why have we not a right to do as we please to dogs and cats, or do you think they feel as we do? Fiddle faddle of your nonsense, say I; come, you must hear the end of my flory. When the dog was dead, we carried him home to little Jemmy, who was ready to break his heart for the loss of him; fo we did not like to stand hearing his whining, therefore left him and got a Cock, whose legs we tied, and flung at him till he died. Then we fet two others to fighting, and fine sport we had; for one was pecked till his breaft was laid open, and the other was blinded; fo we left them to make up their quarrel as they could. After this we picked all the feathers off a live chicken, and you never faw fuch a ridiculous little animal in your life. Then we got fome puppies, and drowned them whilft the bitch flood by. Oh! how the howled and cried, whilft they flruggled on the furface of the water; and there was no quieting her for feveral days. Stop! stop! exclaimed Miss Harriet; for pity's faks, 1) 2 flop!

Itop! I can hear no more of your horrid narrations; nor would I commit even one of those barbarities which you boast of for the world! Poor innocent creatures! what had they done to you to deferve fuch ulage? I beg, Edward, faid his fifter, that you will find some other way to entertain us, or I shall really tell Mrs. Benson of What! you are growing tenderhearted all at once! cried he. I will tell you what I think when I go home, replied Miss Jenkins. As for poor Frederick, he was drowned in tears; and Harriet's flowed in a copious stream, with the bare idea of the fufferings of the poor animals, particularly for the live chicken, and the poor bitch, whose puppies were drowned in her fight: but Edward was so accustomed to be guilty of those things without reflection; that there was no making any impression of tenderness upon his mind; and he only laughed at their concern, and wanted to tell a long story about an ox that had been driven by a cruel drover till he went mad; but Miss Bensen and his sister stopped their As foon as they left off doing fo, he began another about Bat-fowling; which is a treacherous custom of going with a lantern by night to the hedges, where birds rooft, and frightening shem into a net net placed for the purpose. In short, it appeared from his discourse, that he was acquainted with the whole art of tormenting animals. At last little Frederick went crying to his mamma, and the young Ladies retired to another apartment, so Master Jenkins amused himself with catching flies in the window, pulling the legs off from fome, and the wings from others, delighted with their extorsions, which were occasioned by the agonies they endured. Mrs. Benfon had fome vifitors, which prevented her talking to this cruel boy, as she otherwise would have done, on hearing Frederick's account of him, but she determined to tell his papa; which she accordingly did fome time after, when he returned home: but this gentleman, fo far from reproving his fon, applauded him as a lad of life and spirit, and said he would be fit to go through the world.

Master Jenkins was now disturbed from his barbarous sport by being called to tea; and soon after that was over, the servant came to fetch him and his sister. Miss Harriet earnestly entreated her friend Lucy to feed the birds properly, till she should be allowed to fetch them, who promised to do so; for she was greatly affected with Mrs. Benson's discourse, and then entreated her brother to take leave, that she might return home; with this he readily complied, as there were no further opportunities for cruelty.

CHAP. IX.

A FTER her little visitors were departed, Miss Harriet went into the drawing-room, and having paid her compliments, fat herfelf down, that she might improve her mind with the conversation of the company. Her mamma perceived that the had been in tears, of which Frederick had before explained the cause. I do not wonder, my love, faid she, that you should have been fo affected with the relation of such horrid barbarities, as that thoughtless boy has, by degrees, brought himself to practife, not only without remorfe, but by way of amusement. However, do not fuffer your mind to dwell on them, as the creatures on which he inflicted them are no longer objects of pity. It is wrong to grieve for the death of animals as we do for the loss of our own friends, because they certainly are not of fo much confequence to our happiness; and we are taught faught to think their fufferings end with their lives, as they are not religious beings; and therefore the killing them, even in the cruelest manner, is not like murdering a human creature, who is perhaps unprepared to give an account of himself at the tribunal of heaven. I have, faid a Lady who was prefent, been for a long time accustomed to consider animals as mere machines, actuated by the unerring hand of Providence, to do those things which are necessary for the preservation of themselves and their offspring; but the light of the learned Pig, which has lately been fhewn in London, has deranged these ideas, and I know not what to think.

If we puzzle our minds for ever, Madam, on the subject, replied a Gentleman, we shall never be able fully to comprehend the capacities and feelings of creatures fo different from ourselves. That they have not reasonable souls, like the human race, is evident; but at the same time I think we may plainly discover, that they have some portion of intellect, which is even capable of improvement to a certain degree: this is particularly exemplified in the instance which Mrs. Franks has just mentioned of the learned Pig. Mere instinct, I think, would never lead that creature ther, or, which amounts to the same thing, to comprehend the various signs by which they are pointed out to him by his keeper. To what a pitch may Dogs end Horses be improved; nay, every kind of animal that I have had an opportunity of observing, seems to acquire sagacity, by a familiar intercourse with rational creatures; yet, after all, they fall short of human reason beyond comparison.

For my part, replied Mrs. Benson, I find the subject so much above my comprehension, that whenever my mind is difposed to expatiate on it, I check the inclination, from an opinion that it is of no consequence to me, whether animals have intellects or not, and that it is amongst those things which the Almighty has intentionally concealed from our penetrationthey are in the power of man, and fublervient to his use and pleasure, gives them a sufficient claim to our compassion and kindness; and whilst I am partly fed and clothed at the expence of the animal creation, I could not bring myself to inslict wanton cruelties upon them. On the other hand, as Providence has placed them fo much beneath us in the scale of beings, I should think it equally wrong to elevate them them from their proper rank in life, and fuffer them to occupy that share of attention and love, which is due to our own spe-

You are certainly right, Madam, anfwered the Gentleman; there are objects enough for the employment of human reafon, without our endeavouring to penetrate into those things which must ever remain hidden, unless the inferior creatures were endued with speech. We can form but very imperfect ideas even of our own intellectual powers, still less of those of other men; and the farther any creature is removed from us, the less capable are we of comprehending their natures, as we can only judge, in these matters, by what passes in ourselves.

Neither you, Sir, nor Mrs. Benson, said Mrs. Franks, mean, I apprehend, to discourage the study of the natural history of animals. By no means, replied the latter; for as far as it is open to our view, it is replete with amusement and instruction. It leads the mind to contemplate the perfections of the Supreme Being, and also furnishes a variety of useful hints for the conduct of human affairs. Many impertant arts have, in all probability, been derived from them; and the exact regula ity with which they discharge the offices of tenderness and occonomy, afford examples of real utility to those amongst us, who are disposed to neglect the duties of humanity. An idle person, for instance, may be admonished by an Ant or Bee, a thoughtless mother by a Hen, an unfaithful servant by a Dog, and fo on, as one of our Poets has elegantly pointed out in his Fable *. I only mean that we should confine our speculations within due bounds, and not carefs. animals to the neglect of the human race.

Then you would have condemned a Lady of my acquaintance, faid the Gentleman, who has a little Lap-dog on which her happiness totally depends, and to use a vulgar expression, her very life seems to. be wrapped up in his. I am fure it is quite provoking to fee a reasonable creature make herfelf fo ridiculous. It is more than, ridiculous, replied Mrs. Benson; it is really finful. At this instant the arrival of Mrs. Franks's coach was announced, and she,

with the Gentlemen took leave.

As foon as they were gone, pray mamma, faid Harriet, what does the learned Pig do? I had a great defire to ask Mrs. Franks, but was fearful she would think me impertinent. I commend your modesty, my dear, replied Mrs. Benfon, but would not have it lead you into fuch a degree of restraint, as to prevent your gratifying that laudable curiofity, without which young persons must remain ignorant of many things very proper for them to be acquainted with. Mrs. Franks would, I am fure, have been far from thinking you impertinent: Those enquiries only are thought troubleforne, by which children interrupt conversation, and endeavour to attract attention to their own infignificant prattle; but all people of good fense and goodnature delight in giving them useful information. In refpect to the learned Pig, I have heard things which are quite aftonishing in a species of animals generally regarded as very stupid. The creature was thewn for a fight in a room provided for the purpose, where a number of people affembled to view his performances. Twoalphabets of large letters on card paper were placed on the floor; one of the company was then defired to propose a word which he wished the Pig to spell. This his keeper repeated to him, and the Pig picked out every letter fuccessively with his inout, and collected them together till the word was compleated. He was then defired to tell tell the hour of the day, and one of the company held a watch to him, which he feemed with his little cunning eyes to examine very attentively; and having done so, picked out figures for the hour and minutes of the day. He shewed a number of tricks, of the fame nature, to the great diversion of the spectators. For my own part, though I was in London at the time he was exhibited, and heard continually of this wonderful Pig from persons of my acquaintance, I never went to fee him; for I am fully perfuaded, that great cruelty must have been exercised in teaching him things fo foreign to his nature, and therefore would not give any encouragement to fuch a scheme.

And do you think, mamma, faid Harriet, that the Pig knows the letters, and can really spell words? I think it possible, my dear, for the Pig to be taught to know the letters one from the other, and that his keeper has some private sign, by which he directs him to each that are wanted; but that he has an idea of spelling, I can never believe, nor are animals capable of attaining human sciences, because, for these, human faculties are requisite; and no art of man can change the nature of any thing, though he may be able to improve that nature to a certain degree, or at least to call forth to view, powers which would be hidden from us, because they would only be exerted in the intercourse of animals with each other. As far as this can be done by familiarizing them, and shewing them such a degree of kindness as is confistent with our higher obligations, it may be an agreeable amusement, but will never answer any important purpose to mankind; and I would advise you, Harriet, never to give countenance to those people who shew what they call learned animals; as you may affure yourfelf they exercise great barbarities upon them, of which starving them almost to death is most likely among the number. But, my dear, it is now time for you to retire to rest, I will therefore bid you good night.

CHAP. X.

EARLY in the morning the hen Redbreast awakened her young brood. Come, my little ones, said she, shake off your drowfiness, remember this is the day fixed for your entrance into the world. I defire that each of you will dress your feathers before you go out; for a flovenly bird is my aversion, and neatness is a great advantage to the appearance of every one.

The father was upon the wing betimes, that he might give each of his young ones a breakfast before they attempted to leave. the nest. When he had fed them, he defired his mate to accompany him as usual to Mr. Benfon's, where he found the parlour-window open, and his young friends at breakfast with their papa and mamma. Crumbs had been, according to custom, strewed before the window, which the other birds had almost entirely devoured; but the Redbreafts took their usual post on the teatable, and the cock bird fung his morning lay; after which they returned with all poffible speed to the nest, for having so important an affair to manage, they could not be long absent. Neither could their young benefactors pay fo much attention to them as usual, for they were impatient to fetch the birds nests from Mifs Jenkins's; therefore, as foon as breakfast was ended, they fet out on their expedition. Harriet carried a basket large enough to hold two nests, and Frederick a smaller one for the other; thus equipped, with a fervant attending them, they let off. will be will be - 3004333

Mr. Jenkins's house was about a mile from Mr. Benson's, it was delightfully fituated; there was a beautiful lawn and canal before it, and a charming garden behind; on one fide were corn fields, and on the other a wood. In fuch a delightful retreat as this, it was natural to expect to find a great many birds; but, to Miss Harriet's furprize, they faw only a few ftraggling ones here and there, who fled with the utmost precipitation as foon as she and her brother appeared; on which she obferved to Frederick, that the supposed Master Jenkins's practice of taking birds nests had made them so shy, and entreated him never to commit fo barbarous an ac-She faid a great deal to him about the cruelties that naughty boy had boafted of the evening before, which Frederick promised to remember.

As foon as they arrived at the house, Miss Jenkins ran out to receive them, but her brother was gone to school. We are come, my dear Lucy, said Miss Benson, to claim the performance of Master Jenkins's promise; how are your little prisoners? O! I know not what to say to you, my dear, said Miss Jenkins, I have very bad news to tell you, and I fear you will blame exceedingly, though not more than I blame myfelf. I heartily wish I had returned home immediately after the kind lecture your mamma favoured me with yesterday, which shewed me the cruelty of my behaviour, though I was then ashamed to own my conviction. I walked as fast as I could all the way from your house, and determined to give each of the little creatures a good supper; for which purpose I had an egg boiled and very nicely chopped; I mixed up some bread and water very smooth, and put a little feed with the chopped egg amongst it, and then carried it to the room where I left the nefts. But what was my concern, when I found that my care was too late for the greatest part of them! Every Sparrow lay dead and bloody; they feemed to have killed each other. Urged I suppose by extreme hunger, each spent on his unhappy affociates those pecks and blows which were my proper defert. In the nest of Linnets, which were very young, I found one dead, two just expiring, and the other almost exhausted, but still able to fwallow; to him, therefore, I immediately dispensed some of the food I had prepared, which greatly revived him; and as I thought he would fuffer with cold in the nest by himself, I covered him over with wool and had this morning the pleasure of finding ing him quite recovered. What, all the Sparrows and three Linnets dead! faid Frederick, whose little eyes swam with tears at the melancholy tale: And pray, Miss Jenkins, have you starved all the Blackbirds too? Not all, my little friend, answered Miss Jenkins; but I must confess that some of them have fallen victims to my barbarous neglect; however, there are two fine ones alive, which I shall, with the furviving Linnet, cheerfully refign to the care of my dear Harriet, whose tenderness will, I hope, be rewarded by the pleasure of hearing them fing when they are old enough. But I beg you will stay and rest yourselves after your walk. Let me see the birds first, said Frederick. That you shall do, an fwered Mils Jenkins; and taking him by the hand, conducted him to the room in which she kept them, accompanied by Miss Benson. She then sed the birds, and gave particular instructions for making their food, and declared that she would never be a receiver of birds-neits any more, but expressed her apprehensions that it would be difficult to wean Edward from his propenfity for taking them; however, faid the, he is going as a boarder to a private Academy foon, where I think he will have better employment for his leifure hours. kins then took her young friends into the parlour to her Governess (for her mamma was dead) who received them very kindly, and gave each of them a piece of cake and fome fruit; after which, Miss Jenkins led them again into the room where the birds were, and very carefully put the nest, with the poor solitary Linnet, into one basket, and that with the two Blackbirds into the other. Frederick was very urgent to carry the latter, which his sister consented to; and then, bidding adieu to their friend, they set off on their return home, attended by the maid as before.

Well, Frederick, faid Miss Harriet, as they walked along, what think you of birdnefting now? Should you like to occasion the death of fo many little harmless creatures? No, indeed, faid Frederick; and I think Miss Jenkins a very naughty girl for flarving them. She was to blame, but is now forry for her fault, my dear, therefore you must not speak unkindly of her; befides, you know, she has no good mamma. as we have, to teach her what is proper; and her papa is obliged to be absent from home very often, and leave her to the care of a Governess, who perhaps was never instructed herself to be tender to animals. With this kind of conversation they amused them-themselves as they walked, every now and then peeping into their baskets to see their little birds, which were very lively and well. They entreated the maid to take them through the orchard, which had a gate that opened into a meadow that lay in their way, having no doubt of obtaining admittance, as it was the usual hour for their friend Joe to work there. They accordingly knocked at the gate, which was immediately opened to them, and Frederick requested Joe to shew him the Robins nest, But before we proceed with this part of our History, we must return to the Redbreasts, whom we left on the wing, flying back to the ivy-wall, in order to take their young ones abroad.

As the father entered the nest, he cried out, with a cheerful voice, Well, my nestlings, are you all ready? Yes, they replied. The mother then advanced, and desired that each of them would get upon the edge of the nest. Robin and Pecksy sprang up in an instant, but Dicky and Flapsy

The hearts of the parents felt a rapturous delight at the advantageous view they now had of their young family, who appeared to be strong, vigorous, and lively; and, in a word, endued with every gift of nature requisite to their success in the world. Now, faid the father, ftretch your wings, Robin, and flutter them a little in this manner, (shewing him the way) and be fure to observe my directions exactly. Very well, faid he; do not attempt to fly yet, for here is neither air nor space enough for that purpose. Walk gently after me to the wall; now hop, and perch upon this branch, and as foon as you fee me fly away, spread your wings, and exert all the strength you have to follow me. Robin acquitted himself to admiration, and alighted very fafely on the ground. Now stand still, faid the father, till the rest join us: Then going back, he called upon Dicky to do the same as his brother had done; but Dicky was very fearful of fluttering his wings, for he had a great deal of cowardice in his disposition, and expressed many apprehensions that he fhould not be able to reach the ground without-falling, as they were fuch a great height from it. His father, who was a very courageous bird, was quite angry with him. Why

Why you foolish little thing, said he, do you mean to stay in the nest by yourself and starve? I shall leave off bringing you food, I affure you. Do you think your wings were given you to be always folded by your fides, and that the whole employment of your life is to pick your feathers, and make yourfelf look pretty? Without exercise you cannot long enjoy health; befides, you will foon have your livelihood to earn, and therefore idleness would in you be the height of folly; get up this instant. Dicky, intimidated by his father's displeasure, got up, and advanced as far as the branch from which he was to descend; but here his fears returned, and instead of making an effort to fly, he flood flapping his wings in a most irresolute manner, and fuffered his father to lead the way twice without following him. This good parent, finding that he would not venture to fly, took a circuit unperceived by Dicky, and watching the opportunity when his wings were a little fpread, came fuddenly behind him, and pushed him off from the branch. Dicky, finding himself in actual danger of falling, now gladly stretched his pinions, and, upborn by the air, gently descended to the ground, so near the spot where Robin stood, that the latter easily reached him by hopping. The mother now undertook to conduct Flapfy and Peckly, whilst the father staid to take care of the two already landed. Flapfy made a thousand difficulties, but at length yielded to her mother's persuasions, and flew fafely down. Peckfy, without the least hesitation, accompanied her, and by exactly following the directions given, found the task much easier than she expected. As foon as they had a little recovered from the fatigue and fright of their first essay at flying, they began to look around them with aftonishment. Every object on which they turned their eyes excited their curiofity and wonder. They were no longer confined to a little nest, built in a small hole, but were now at full liberty in the open air. The orchard itself appeared to them a world. For some time each remained filent, gazing around, first at one thing, then at another: at length Flaply cried out, what a charming place the world is! I had no conception that it was half for big! And do you suppose then, my dear, replied the mother, that you now behold the whole of the world? I have feen but a fmall part of it myfelf, and yet have flown over fo large a space, that what is at prefent within our view appears to me a little incon= inconfiderable spot; and I have conversed with feveral foreign birds, who informed me, that the country they came from was so distant, that they were many days on their journey hither, though they flew the nearest way, and scarcely allowed themfelves any resting-time. Come, said the father, let us proceed to bufiness, we did not leave the neft merely to look about us, You are now, my young ones, fafely landed on the ground, let me instruct you what you are to do on it. Every living creature that comes into the world has fomething allotted him to perform, and therefore should not stand an idle spectator of what others are doing. We finall birds have a very eafy task, in comparison of many animals I have had an opportunity of observing, being only required to seek food for ourselves, build nests, and provide for our young ones till they are able to procure their own livelihood. We have indeed enemies to dread; Hawks and other birds of prey will catch us up, if we are not upon our guard; but the worst foes we have are those of the human race; though even among them Redbreafts have a better chance than many other birds, on occount of a charitable action which a pair of our species are said to have performed to a little Aittle boy and girl * who were lost in a wood, where they were starved to death. The Redbreasts I mention saw the affectionate pair, hand in hand, stretched on the cold ground, and would have fed them, had they been capable of receiving nourishment; but finding them quite dead, and being unable to bury them, refolved to cover them with leaves. This was an arduous task, but many a Redbreast has since shared the reward of it; and I believe, that those who do good to others, always meet with a recompense some way or other. But I declare I am doing the very thing I was reproving you for---chattering away when I should be minding business. Come, hop after me, and we shall soon find something worth having. Fear nothing, for you are now in a place of fecurity; there is no Hawk near, and I have never feen any of the human race enter this orchard, but the, monsters who paid you visits in the nest, and others equally inoffensive. The father then hopped away, followed by Robin and Dicky, whilst his mate conducted the female part of the family. The parents instructed their young ones in what manner to feek for food, and they proved very fuccessful, for there were a number of infects just at hand. Dicky had the good fortune to find four little worms together, but inflead of calling his brothers and fifters to partake of them, he devoured them all himself. Are you not ashamed, you little greedy creature? crid his father, who observed his selfish disposition. What would you think of your brother and fifters, were they to ferve you fo? In a family, every individual ought to confult the welfare of the whole, instead of his own private fatisfaction. It is his own truest interest to do so. A day may come, when he who has now fufficient to fupply the wants of his relations, may stand in need of affiftance from them. But fetting aside felfish considerations, which are the last that ever find place in a generous breaft, how great is the pleasure of doing good, and contributing to the happiness of others! Dicky was quite confounded, and immediately hopped away, if posfible to find fomething for his brother and fifter, that he might regain their good opinion.

In the mean while Robin found a caterpillar, which he intended to take for Peckfy; but just as he was going to pick it up, a E Linnet, Linnet, who had a nest in the orchard, fnatched it from him and flew away with. Inflamed with the most furious rage, Robin advanced to his father, and entreated that he would fly after the Linnet and tear his heart out. That would be taking violent revenge indeed, faid his father. No, Dicky, the Linnet has as great a right to the catterpillar as you or I; and, in all probability, has many little gaping mouths at home ready to receive it. But, however this may be, I had, for my own part, rather fustain an injury than take revenge. You must expect to have many a scramble of this kind in your life; but if you give way to a refentful temper, you will do yourself more harm than all the enemies in the world can do you; for you will be in perpetual agitation from an idea, that every one who does not act in direct conformity to your wishes, has a defign against you. Therefore, restrain your anger that you may be happy; for believe me, peace and tranquility are the most valuable things you can possess. At this instant Pecksy came up with a fine fat spider in her mouth, which The laid down at her mother's feet, and thus addressed her: Accept, my dear parent, the first tribute of gratitude which I have ever been able to offer you. How have I forI formerly longed to ease those toils which you and my dear father endured for our fakes; and gladly would I now release you from farther fatigue on my account, but I am still a poor unexperienced creature, and must continue to take shelter under your wing. All my power to affift you shall however be exerted, and I will hop as long as I am able to procure provisions for the family. The eyes of the mother sparkled with delight; and knowing that Peckfy's love would be disappointed by a refusal, she eat the spider, which the dutiful neftling had so affectionately brought her, and then faid-How happy would families be, if every one like you, my dear Peckfy, consulted the happiness of the rest, instead of turning their whole attention to their own interest. Dicky was not present at this speech, which he might have considered as a reflection on his own conduct; but he arrived as it was ended, and presented Peckfy with a worm, like those he had himself so greedily eaten. She received it with thanks, and declared it was doubly welcome from his beak. Certainly, faid the mother, fraternal love stamps a value on the most trifling presents. Dieky se't himself happy in having regained the good E 2 opinion opinion of his mother, and obliged his fifter, and resolved for the future to be generous.

The young Redbreafts foon after all collected together, near the gate which led into the meadow, when they were fuddenly alarmed with a repetition of the same noises which had formerly so terrified them in the nest; and Robin, who was foremost, beheld, to his very great amazement, Mafter and Miss Benson, the maid who attended them, and Joe the gardener, who having opened the gate, was, at the request of his young Master and Mistress, conducting them to the ivy-wall. Robin, with all his courage, and indeed he was not deficient in this qualification, was feized with a great tremor; for if the view he had of the faces of these persons had appeared so dreadful to him when he fat in the neft, what must it now be, to behold their full fize, and fee them advancing with, as he thought, gigantic strides, towards him! He expected nothing less than to be crushed to death with the foot of one of them; and not having yet attained his full strength, and never having raifed himself in the air, he knew not how to escape; therefore chirped so loudly, as not only to surprize his brother and fifters, and bring his father and mother to enquire the meaning of his cry, but but also to attract the attention of Master and Miss Benson-what chirping is that? cried the latter-It was, cried the maid, the cry of a young bird; was it not one of those in the baskets? No, said Frederick, the noise came that way, pointing to some current-trees.-My birds are very well, and fo is my Linnet, replied Harriet-Frederick then fet down his charge very carefully, and began looking about in the place from whence he supposed the sound proceeded, when to his great joy he foon discovered the Redbreasts and their little family. He called eagerly to his fifter, who was equally pleased with the light. Frederick then Rooped down to take a nearer view of them, by which means he directly fronted Robin, who, as foon as the young gentleman's face was on a level with his eyes, recollected him, and calling to his brother and fifters, told them they need not be afraid. Mils Benfon followed her brother's example, and delighted the little flock with the fight of her benign countenance. She heartily lamented having nothing with which to regale her old favourites and their family, when Frederick produced from his pocket a piece of biscuit which they crumbled and scattered. Miss Benson recollecting E that her mamma would expect her at home, and that the birds in the basket would be hungry, persuaded her brother to take up his little load and return; they therefore left the Redbreasts enjoying the fruits of their bounty.

CHAP. XII.

THEN the happy birds had shared amongst them the acceptable prefent made by their young benefactors, the mother reminded her mate that it would be proper to think of returning to the nest. If the little ones fatigue themselves too much with hopping about, faid she, their strength will be exhausted, and they will not be able to fly back. True, my love, replied her mate, gather them under your wings a little, as there is no reason to apprehend danger here, and then we will fee what they can do. She complied with his defire, and when they were fufficiently refled, got up, on which the whole brood instantly raised themselves on their feet. Now Robin, cried the father, let us fee your dexterity at flying; come, I will shew VOU

you how to raise yourself. O! you need not take that trouble, faid the conceited bird, as I flew down, I warrant I know how to fly up: then spreading his wings, he attempted to rife, but in so unskilful a manner, that he only shuffled along upon the ground. That will not do, however, cried the father, shall I shew you now? Robin persisted in it that he stood in no need of instruction, and tried again; he managed to raise himself a little way, but foon tumbled headlong. His mother then began reproving him for his obstinacy, and advised him to accept his father's kind offer of teaching him. You may depend on it, Robin, faid fhe, that he is in every respect wifer than you; and as he has had fo much practice, he must of course be expert in the art of flying; and if you perfift in making your own foolish experiments, you will only commit a number of errors, and make yourfelf ridiculous; I should commend your courage, provided you would add prudence to it; but blundering on in this ignorant manner, is only rashness. Let him alone, let him alone, faid the father; if he is above being taught, he may find his own way to the nest, I will teach his brother. Come, faid he, Dicky, let us fee what you can do at flying upwards, you cut a noble figure this morning when you flew down. Dicky, with reluctance, advanced; he faid he did not fee what occasion they had to go back: to the neft at all; he should suppose they might eafily find fome faug corner to creep into, till they were strong enough to rooft in trees, as other birds did. Why you, faid the father, are as ridiculous with your timidity; as Robin with his conceitedness. Those who give way to groundless fears, generally expose themselves to real dangers; if you rest on the earth all night, you will fuffer a great deal from cold and damp, and may very likely be devoured whilft you fleep, by rats and other creatures that goout in the night to feek for food; whereas, if you determine to go back to the nest, you have but one effort to make; for which, I will venture to fay, you have a sufficient degree of firength, and then you will lie warm, safe, and quiet: however, do as you will. Dicky began to think that it was his interest to obey his father, and said he would endeavour to fly up, but was still fearful he should not be able to effect it. Never despair, replied his father, of doing what others have done before you. your eyes upwards, and behold what numbers of birds are at this instant soaring in the

the air. They were once all neftlings like yourself. See there that new-fledged Wren, with what courage he skims along; let it not be faid, that a Redbreast lies groveling on the earth, whilft a Wren foars above him! Dicky was now affiamed of himfelf, and inspired with emulation; therefore, without delay, fpread his wings and his tail; his father with pleasure placed himfelf in a proper attitude before him, then rifing from the ground, led the way, and Dicky, by carefully following his example, fafely arrived at the nest, which he found a most comfortable resting-place after the fatigue of the morning, and rejoiced that he had a good father to teach him what was most conducive to his welfare.

The father having seen him safe home, returned to his mate, who during his short absence, had been endeavouring to convince Robin of his fault, but to no purpose; he did not like to be taught, what he still persuaded himself he could do by his own exertions; she therefore applied herself to Flapsy. Come my dear, said she, get ready to sollow me when your sather returns, for the sun casts a great heat here, and the nest will be quite comfortable to you. Flapsy dreaded the experiment; however, as she could not but blame both E 5

Robin's and Dicky's conduct, she resolved to do her best; but entreated her mother to inform her very particularly how to proceed. Well then, said the tender parent, observe me. First bend your legs, then spring from the ground as quick as you can, stretching your wings as you rife, straight out on each side of your body; thake them with a quick motion, as you will fee me do, and the air will yield to you, and at the fame time support your weight; which ever way you want to turn, strike the air with the wing on the contrary fide, and that will bring you about. She then rose from the ground, and having practifed two or three times repeatedly, what she had been teaching, Flapfy at length ventured to follow her, but with a palpitating heart; and was foon happily feated in the nest by the side of Dicky, who rejoiced that his favourite fifter was lafely arrived.

The mother bird now went back to Peckly, who was waiting with her father till she returned; for the good parent chose to leave the semale part of his family to the particular management of their mother. Peckly was fully prepared for her flight, for she had attentively observed the instruction given to the others, and also their

their errors; she therefore kept the happy medium betwixt felf-conceit and timidity, indulging that moderated emulation, which ought to possess every young heart; and refolving that neither her inferiors or: equals should foar above her, she sprang from the ground, and with a steadiness and agility, wonderful for her first essay, followed her mother to the nest, who now rested herself, waiting with impatience for the arrival of Robin and her mate; but Robin disappointed her hopes, for he sat fulky; though convinced that he had been in the wrong, he would not humble himself to his father; who therefore refolved to leave him a little while, taking his stand, however, on an adjoining tree, that he might be at hand to affift him should he repent of his folly: as soon as Robin found himself deserted, instead of being forry, he gave way to anger and refentment; -Why, cried he, am I to be treated in this manner, who am the eldest of the family, whilst all the little darlings are fondled and careffed? But I don't care, I can get to the nest yet, I make no doubt; he then attempted to fly, and after a great many trials, at length got up in the air, but knew not which way to direct his courfe; and fometimes turned to the right, and

and fometimes to the left; now he advanced forwards a little, and now, fearing he was wrong, came back again: at length quite spent with fatigue, he fell to the ground and bruised himself a good deal; stunned with the fall, he lay for some minutes. without sense or motion, but soon revived; and finding himself alone in this dismal condition, the horrors of his fituation filled him with dreadful apprelienfions, and the bitterest remorfe. Oh! cried he, that I had but followed the advice and example of my tender parents, then had I been fafe in the nest, blest with their kind caresses, and enjoying the company of my dear brother and fifters! but now I am; of all birds, the most wretched! never shall I be able to fly, for every joint of me has received a shock which I doubt it will not recover. Where shall I find shelter from the fcorching fun, whose piercing rays already render the ground I lie on intolerably hot? What kind beak will fupply me with food to assuage the pangs of hunger which I shall soon feel? By what means shall I procure even a drop of water to quench that thirst which so frequently returns? Who will protect me from the various tribes of barbarous animals which I have been told make a prey of birds? Oh! my dear

dear, my tender mother, if the found of my voice can reach your ears, pity my condition, and fly to my succour. The kind parent waited not for farther folicitation, but darting from the branch on which she had been a painful eye-witness of Robin's fall, she instantly stood before him. I have liftened, faid she, to your lamentations; and fince you feem convinced of your error, will not add to your fuffering by my reproaches; my heart relents towords you, and gladly would I afford you all the aid in my power: but alas! I can do but little for your relief; however, let me perfuade you, toexert all the strength you have, and use every effort for your own prefervation; I will endeavour to procure you some refreshment, and at the same time contrive means of fixing you in a place of more fecurity and comfort, than that in which you at present lie. So faying, she flew to a little stream which slowed in an adjacent meadow, and fetched from the brink of it, a worm which she had observed an angler to drop as she perched on the tree; with this she immediately returned to the penitent Robin, who received the welcome gift with gratitude. kindness, he was able to stand up, and on fhaking his wings, found that he was not fo greatly hurt as he apprehended; his head, indeed, was bruised, so that one eye was almost closed, and he had injured the joint of one wing fo that he could not poffibly fly: however, he could manage to hop, and the parent bird observing that Joe the gardener was cutting a hawthorn hedge, which was near the spot, defired Robin to follow her; this he did, tho' with great pain. Now, faid she, look carefully about, and you will foon find infects of one kind or another for your fustenance, during the remainder of the day, and before evening I will return to you again. Summon all your courage, for I make no doubt you will be fafe whilft our friend continues his work, as none of those creatures which are enemies to birds will venture to come near him. Robin took a forrowful farewel, and the mother flew to the nest. You have been absent a long time my love, said her mate, but I perceived that you were indulging your tenderness towards that difobedient neftling, who has rendered himfelf unworthy of it; however, I do not condemn you for giving him affiltance, for had not you undertaken the task I would myfelf have flown to him, instead of returning turning home; how is he, likely to live and reward your kindness? Yes, said she, he will, I flatter myself, soon perfectly recover, for his hurt is not very confiderable; and I have the pleasure to tell you; he is extremely fenfible of his late folly, and I dare fay will endeavour to repair his fault with future good behaviour: this is pleasing news indeed, said he. The little nestlings delighted to hear their dear brother was fafe, and convinced of his error; expressed the utmost joy and satisfaction, and entreated their father to let them defeend again and keep him company; to this he would by no means confent, because, as he told them, the fatigue would be too great; and it was proper that Robin should feel a little longer the consequences of his prefumption: to-morrow, faid he, your shall pay him a visit, but to day he must be by himself: on this they dropped their request, knowing that their parent was the beil judge what was proper to be done; and not doubting, but that his affection would lead him to every thing that was conducive to the real happiness of his samily: but yet they could not tell how to be happy without Robin, and were continually perking up their little heads, fancying they heard his cries; both the father and. and mother frequently took a peep at him; and had the satisfaction of seeing him very safe by their friend Joe the gardener. But it is time to enquire after Master and Miss Benson.

CHAP. XIII.

HIS happy pair arrived at the house foon after they left the Redbreafts, and communicated every circumstance of their expedition to their kind mamma; who hearing their little prisoners in the basket chirp very loudly, defired they would immediately go and feed them; which they gladly did, and then took a short lesson. Mrs. Benson told Miss Harriet that she was going to make a vifit in the afternoon, and fhould take her with her, therefore defired The would keep herself quite still, that she might not be fatigued after the walk she had had in the morning; for though she meant to go in the coach, it was her in tention to return on foot, as the weather was fo remarkably fine. The young lady took great care of the birds, and Frederick engaged, with the affiftance of the maid, maid, to feed them during her absence. Miss Ben on was then dressed to attend her mamma. Mrs. Addis, to whose house they were going, was a widow lady; she had two children, Master Charles a boy of twelve years old at school, and Miss Augusta about seven at home. But these children were quite strangers to Miss Benson. On entering the half, the young lady took notice of a very disagreeable sincll, and was furprifed with the appearance of a parrot, a paroquet, and a macaw, all in most elegant cages. In the next room she came to, were a fquirrel and a monkey, which had each a little house neatly ornamented. On being introduced into the drawing-room, she observed in one corner a lap-dog lying on a splendid cushion; and in a beautiful little cradle, which she supposed to contain a large wax doll, lay, in great state, a cat, with a litter of kittens. In vain did Miss Harriet look for Mrs. Addis's children, for neither of them appeared. After the usual compliments of salutation were over, I have, faid Mrs. Benfon, taken the liberty of bringing my daughter with me, madam, in hopes of inducing you to favour us in return, with the company of Mafter and Mifs Addis. You are very obliging, madam, replied the lady; lady; but indeed I never take my children with me, they are so rude; on the contrary, I am obliged to keep the boy almost continually at school, for he is so cruel to my dear little precious creatures, that there is no bearing him at home; and as for Augusta, it will be time enough some years hence for her to go a visiting. I am forry to hear you say this, madam, said Mrs. Benson, but hope my daughter will at least be indulged with feeing Miss Addis to day, or I shall think you are displeased at my bringing Harriet here. This in reality was the case, and Mrs. Benson perceived it, for the lady looked very cross; however, she could not refuse having her daughter come into the drawing-room, as her guest so particularly defired it. Miss Harriet was very curious to examine the various animals which were collected together by this extraordinary lady; but as her mamma never fuffered her to run about when she accompanied her to other people's houses, she sat down and kept quite still, only glancing her eye first to one part of the room, and then to the other, as her attention was fuccessively attracted. Mrs. Addis rang the bell, and ordered that Augusta might come to her. The footman, who had never before received fuch a command, (for Mrs. Addis only faw

However, on his mistress's repeating, "that the little girl was to be brought down," he went to tell the nursery-maid to take her. What new fancy is this? faid she, Who would ever have thought of her wanting the child in the drawing-room? I have no stockings clean for her, not a frock to put on but what is all to pieces; I wish she would spend less on her cats, and dogs, and monkies, and then her child might appear as she ought to do. I won't go up stairs, Nanny, faid the child, mamma is fo cross to me. But you must, said Nanny; besides, there is a pretty young lady come to fee you; and if you will go like a good girl, you shall have a piece of fugar'd bread and butter for your supper; and you shall carry the new doll which your god-mamma gave you, to shew your little visitor. These bribes had the defired effect, and Miss Augusta went into the drawing-room; but instead of entering it like a young lady, with a genteel curtley, she stopped at the door, hung down her head, and looked like a little simpleton. Miss Benson was so furprised at her awkwardness, that she did not know what to do, and looked at her mamma; who faid, Harriet, my love, can't you take take the little lady by the hand and lead her to me? I believe she is afraid of stran-On this Mils Harriet arole to do fo; but Augusta, apprehensive that she would finacth her doll away, was going to run out, only she was not able to open the door. Mrs. Benson was quite shocked to see how fickly, dirty, and ragged this child was, and what a very vulgar figure she made, for want of instruction; but Mrs. Addis was so taken up at that instant with the old lap-dog, which had, as the thought, fallen into a fit, that she did not mind her entrance; and before the perceived it, the child went up to the cradle in order to put her doll into it; and feized one of the kittens by the neck, the fqueaking of which, provoked the old cat to feratch her, and this made her cry and drop the kitten on the floor. Mrs. Addis feeing this, flew to the little beaft, endeavoured to footh it with careffes, and was going to beat Augusta for touching it, but Mrs. Benfon interceded for her; though fhe could scarcely gain attention, Mrs. Addis being so greatly agitated. Tea was now ordered, and Miss Augusta being urgent to go to her maid, Mrs. Benfon thought it best she should be indulged; and therefore faid, the was fure Harriet would not defire to detain her against her inclinations;

Š,

The tea things being fet, the footman came in with the urn, which employing both his hands, he left the door open; and was, to the great terror of Miss Harriet, and even of her mamma too, followed by the monkey they faw in the hall, who having broke his chain, came to make a visit to his lady: The, far from being disconcerted, seemed highly pleased with his cleverness. O my sweet dear pug, said fhe, are you come to fee us? Pray shew how like a gentleman you can behave : just as The had faid this, he leaped upon the teatable, and took cup after cup, and threw them on the ground, till he broke half the fet; then jumped on the back of his miftress's chair, and tore the cover of it; in fhort, as foon as he had finished one piece of mischief, he began another; till Mrs. Addis, though vaftly diverted with his wit, was obliged to have him caught and confined; after which she began making tea, and quietness was for a short time restored. But Mrs. Benson, though capable of converling on most subjects, could not engage Mrs. Addis in any discourse, but upon the perfections of her birds and beafts; and a variety variety of uninteresting particulars were related, concerning their wit or misfortunes. On hearing the clock strike feven, the begged Mrs. Benfon's excuse; but faid she made it a constant rule, to see all her dear darlings fed at that hour, and entreated that she and the young lady would take a turn in the garden in the mean-while. This was very unpolite, but Mrs. Benson defired the would use no ceremonies with her, and was really glad of the respite it gave her from company fo irksome; and Miss Harriet was happy to be alone with her mamma: she, however, forbore to make any remarks on Mrs. Addis, because she kad been taught, that it did not become young persons to censure the behaviour of those who were older than themselves. The garden was spacious, but overrun with weeds; the gravel-walks were fo rough for want of rolling, that it was quite painful to thread on them; and the grass on the lawn fo long, that there was no walking with any comfort, for the gardener was al. most continually going on some errand or another for Mrs. Addis's darlings; so Mrs. Benson and her daughter sat down on a garden-feat, with an intention of waiting there till Mrs. Addis should summon them. Miss Harriet could not refrain from expresling

Eng a wish that it was time to go home: to which Mrs. Benfon replied, that she did not wonder at her desire to return, but, faid she, my dear, as the world was not made merely for us, we must endeavour to be patient under every difagreeable circumstance we meet with. I know what opinion you have formed of Mrs. Addis, and should not have brought you to be a spectator of her follies, had I not hoped that an hour or two passed in her company, would afford you a lesson which might be useful to you through life. I have before told you, that our affections towards the inferior parts of the creation should be properly regulated; you have, in your friend Miss Jenkins and her brother, seen instances of cruelty to them, which I am fure you will never be inclined to imitate; but I was apprehensive you might fall into the contrary extreme, which is equally blameable. Mrs. Addis you fee, has absolutely transferred the affection she ought to feel for her child, to creatures who would really be much happier without it. As for puss who lies in the cradle in all her splendor, I will engage to say, she would pass her time pleasanter in a basket of clean straw, placed in a situation where the could occasionally amuse herself with catching catching mice. The lap-dog is, I am fure, a miserable object, full of diseases, the confequences of luxurious living. How enviable is the lot of a spaniel, that is at liberty to be the companion of his master's walks, when compared with his! Mr. Pug I am certain would enjoy himself much more in his native wood. And I am greatly miftaken, if the parrots, &c. have not cause to wish themselves in their respective countries, or at least divided into separate families, where they would be better attended; for Mrs. Addis, by having such a number of creatures, has put it out of her power to see properly with her own eyes to all. But come, let us go back into the house, the time for our going home draws near, and I wish not to prolong my visit. Saying this she arose, and with her daughter went into the drawing-room, which opened into the garden; the other door which led to the adjoining apartments was not flut, and gave them an opportunity of hearing what really distressed Mrs. Benson, and perfectly terrified the gentle Harriet. "Be gone, wretch," fays Mrs. Addis, "begone this instant," "you shall not stay a moment longer in this house." "I hope, madam, you will have the goodness to give me a character; indeed and indeed, I fed Poll.

Poll, but I believe he got cold when you let him stand out of doors the other day. I will give you no character I tell you, fo depart this inftant, Oh my poor, dear, dear, creature! Mrs. Addis recollected herself sulficiently, to beg pardon for neglecting to pay attention to her, but declared, that the dreadful missortune that had befallen her, had made her infentible to every thing elfe. What can be the matter? faid Mrs, Benfon, Have you heard of the death of a dear friend, has your child met with an accident? Oh! no, faid the, but roor Poll is taken suddenly ill; my dear Poll which I have had these seven years, and I scar he never will recover. If this is all, madam, faid Mrs. Benson, I really cannot pity you, nor excuse your behaviour to me; for it is an instance of diffesport, which I believe no other person but yourself would show me, and I shall take my leave of you: house for every but before I go, peim't me to fay, that you act in a very wrong manner, and will certainly feel the ill effects of your injustice to your fellow-creatures, in thus robbing them of the love you owe them, to lavish it away on those who are really sufferers by your kindness. At this instant the scotman entered to inform Mrs. Benson that her servant was come, on which, accompanied by Miss Harriet, she, without surther ceremony, lest Mrs. Addis to compose herself as she could.

As they walked along, both Mrs. Benfon and her daughter continued filent, for the former was greatly agitated, and the latter quite in consternation at what had lately passed; but their attention was scon awakened by the supplication of a poor woman, who entreated them to give her some relief, as the had a fick hufband and feven children in a starving condition; of which, she faid, they might be eye-witnesses, if they would have the goodness to step into a barn The invitation of wretchedness never was given in vain to Mrs. Benson; her heart was ever awake to the tender feelings of humanity; and taking her daughter by the hand, and defiring the fervant to stop for her, she followed the weman, who conducted her to the manfions of real woe, where the beheld a father, furrounded [111] rounded with his helpless family, whom he could no longer supply with sustenance; and he himself, though his disease was subdued, was almost on the point of expiring, for want of some reviving cordial. How came you to be in this condition, good woman? faid Mrs. Benfon to his wife; furely you might have obtained relief before your husband was reduced to such extremity? Oh! my good Lady, faid the woman, we have not been used to beg, but to earn an honest livelihood by our industry; and never, till this fad day, have I known what it was to ask charity: and the first time I could bring myself to do it, I made application at the only great house in this village, where I made no doubt there vas abundance. I told my difinal tale to a fervant, and begged she would make it known to her miftress; but the affured me it was in vain to come there, for her Lady had fuch a family of cats, dogs, monkies, and all manner of creatures, that she had nothing to spare for poor people; at the fame instant I saw a poulterer bring a rabbit and a fowl, which I found were for the favourite cat and dog. This difcouraged me from begging; and I had determined to die before I would ask again; but the fight of my dear husband and children in

in this condition, drives me to it. Welf, comfort yourself, said Mrs. Benson, I will take care of you all. Come to my house to-morrow morning, and we will fee what we can do; in the mean time here is something for a present supply. Mrs. Benson then departed, as the was fearful of walking Miss Harriet was greatly affected with this fcene, and could no longer help exclaiming against Mrs. Addis. She is deferving of great blame, indeed, faid Mrs. Benson; but I have the pleasure to say, fuch characters as her's are very uncommon, I mean in the extreme; though there are numbers of people who fall into the fame fault in some degree, and make themfelves truly ridiculous with their unnatural affections. I wish you, whilst your mind is young, to guard it against such a blameable weakness. Miss Harriet assured her mamma, that the should never forget either Mrs. Addis, or the leffon she had received on the fubject, and then expressed her satisfaction that they had met the poor woman. I rejoice fincerely, faid Mrs. Benson, that I was fortunate enough to be in time to affift this poor wretched family, and hop, my love, you will, out of your own little purie, contribute fomething to-morrow towards their relief. Most willingly, said Harriet, Harriet, they shall be welcome to my whole store. They kept talking on this subject till they arrived at home. Little Frederick, who fat up an hour beyond his time, came out to meet them, and affured his fifter, that the birds were well and fast afleep. I think, faid she, it is time for you and I to follow their example; for my part, with my morning and evening walk together, I am really tired, so shall beg leave to wish you a good night, my dear mamma; papa, I suppose, will not be at home this week. No, my dear, nor the hext, said Mrs. Benson, for he has many affairs to fettle in the West. I am rather latigued also, and shall from refire to Feit.

When he had been for some time by himself, his mother made him another vifit, and told him she had interceded with his father, whose anger was abated, and he would come to him before he went to rest. Robin rejoiced to hear that there was a chance of his being reconciled to his father, yet he dreaded the first inferview; however, as it must be, he wished to have it over as foon as possible; and every wing he heard beat the air, he fancied to be that of his offended parent. In this state of anxious expectation he continued almost to the time of sun-setting, when, of a fudden, he heard the wellknown voice to which he used to listen with joy, but which now caused his whole frame to tremble; but observing a beam of benignity in that eye, in which he looked for anger and reproach, he cast himself in the most supplicating posture at the feet of his father, who could no longer refift the desire he felt to receive him into favour. Your present humility, Robin, said he, disarms my resentment; I gladly pronounce your pardon, and am persuaded you will never again incur my displeasure; we will therefore fav no more on a fubject which gives so much pain to both of us. Yes, my dear, my too-indulgent father, cried Robin, Robin, permit me to make my grateful acknowledgments for your kindness, and to affure you of my future obedience. delighted parent accepted his submission, and the reconciliation was compleated. Robin now felt himself greatly relieved; but on his father's asking him what he intended to do with himself at night, his spirits sunk again, and he answered, He did not know. Well, faid the father, I have thought of an expedient to secure you from cold at least. In a part of the orchard, a very little way from hence, there is a place belonging to our friend the gardener; there I have sheltered myself from feveral fforms, and I am fure it will afford you a comfortable lodging; so follow me, before it is too late. The old bird then led the way, and his lame fon followed him; when they arrived, they found the door of the tool-house open, and as the threshold was low, Robin managed to get over it. His father looked carefully about, and at last found, in a corner, a parcel of threds, kept for the purpose of nailing up trees. Here, Robin, cried he, is a charming bed for you, let me fee you in it, and call your mother to have a peep, and then I must bid you good night; so faying away he flew, and brought his mate, who was perfectly fatisfied with the lodging provided for her late undutiful, but now repetitant for; but reminded by her mate that if they flaid longer they might be that in, they took leave, telling Robin they would vifit him early in the morning Though this habitation was much better than Robin expected, and he was ready enough to own, better than he deferved, yet he deeply regretted his absence from the neft, and longed to fee again his brown ther and fifters: however, though part of the night was spent in bitter reflections, fatigue at length prevailed over anxiety, and he fell afleen. The heftlings were greatly pleased to find that Robin was likes ly to escape the dangers of the night, and even the anxious mother at length religioed herfelf to repete. Before the fun thewed his glorious face in the east, every indiviclual of this affectionate family were awake; the father with impatience waited for the gardener's opening the took houfel, the mother prepared her little enes for a new excurlies. You will be able to defeend with mare tale, my dears, to-day, than you did yesterday, shall you not? O yes, mother, faid Dicky, I shall not be at all afraid; nor Is faid Flapfy. I will shew you the way. On this, with gradual flight, the mother bent her course to a spot near the place where Robin lay concealed; they all instantly followed her, and furprized their father, who having feen Joe, was every instant expeding he would open the door; at length, to the joy of the whole party, the gardener appeared, and they feon faw him fetch his Theers and leave the tool-house open: on this the mother proposed that they should all go together and call Robin. There they found him in his faug little bed; but who can describe the happy meeting? who can find words to express the raptures which filled every little bosom? When the first transports subsided, I think, said the father, it will be best to retire from hence; if our friend returns, he may take us for a fet of thieves, and suppose that we came to eat his feeds, and I should be forry he should have an ill opinion of us. Well, I am ready, faid his mate, and we, cried the whole brood; they accordingly left the tool-house, and hopped about among the current-bushes. I think, said the father, that you who have the full use of your limbs, could manage to get up these low trees, but Robin must content himself upon the ground a little longer. This was very morti-

At the usual hour of visiting Mrs. Benfon's tea-table, the affectionate pair took their morning's flight, and found the young Gentleman and Lady with their mamma. They had been up a long time, for Frederick had made in his bed-chamber a lodging for the birds, who had awakened both him and his fifter at a very early hour, and they rose with great readiness to perform the kind office they had imposed on themselves. The two Blackbirds were perfectly well, but the Linnet looked rather drooping, and they began to be apprehensive they should not raise him, especially when they sound he was not inclined to eat. As for the Blackbirds, they were very hungry indeed; and their youngbenefactors, not confidering that when fed by their parents, young birds wait fometime between every morfel, fupplied them too fast, and filled their crops so full, that they looked as if they had great wens on their necks; and Harriet perceived one of them.

them gasping for breath. Stop, Frederick, faid the, as he was carrying the quill to its mouth, the bird is fo full he can hold no more; but she spoke too late; the little creature gave his eyes a ghaftly roll, and fell on one fide suffocated with abundance. Oh! he is dead! he is dead! cried Frederick; he is indeed, faid Miss Benson, but I am fure we did not design to kill him; and it is some satisfaction to think that we did not take the neft. This confideration was not fufficient to comfort Frederick, who began to cry most bitterly. His mamma hearing him, was apprehensive he had hurt himself, for he seldom cried unless he was in great pain; she therefore hastily entered the room, to enquire what was the matter, on which Miss Harriet related the disaster that had happened. Mrs. Benfon then fat down, and taking Frederick in her lap, wiped his eyes, and giving him a kifs, faid, I am forry, my love, for your disappointment, but do not afflict yourfelf, the poor little thing is out of his pain now, and I fancy suffered but for a mort time. If you keep on crying fo, you will forget to feed your flock of birds, which I fancy, by the chipping I heard from my window, are beginning to affem-He. hand of charity. The woman received her benefaction with grateful acknowledgments; and praying that the Almighty might shower down his choicest blessings on this worthy family, respectfully took leave and returned to her husband, who every hour gathered strength.

She was scarcely gone out of the room, when the Redbreasts entered, as I before related. The fight of them perfectly reflored Frederick's cheerfulness; and after they were departed, he requested his mamma, that he and Harriet might go again to the orchard, in hopes of feeing the young Robins. That you shall do, Frederick, faid she, upon condition that you continue a very good boy; but as yesterday was rather an idle day with you, you must apply a little closer to-day; and Harriet has a great deal of business to do, therefore you must wait till evening, and then perhaps I may go with you. Frederick was fatisfied with this promife, and took great pains to learn to read and spell. He repeated by heart all the hymns and other little things he had been taught; and Miss. Benfon applied herfolf to a variety of different lesions with great assiduity, and performed her task of work entirely to her memma's fatisfiction.

CHAP. XIV.

S foon as the old Redbreafts left their little family, in order to go to Mr. Benson's, Pecksy, with great solicitude, began to ask Robin where he had hurt himfelf, and how he did? Oh! faid he, I am much better; but it is a wonder I am now alive, for you cannot think what a dreadful fall I had. With turning about as I did in the air, I became quite giddy, fo could not make the least exertion for faving myfelf as I was falling, and came with great force to the ground; you fee how my eye is still swelled; but that is nothing to what it was. My wing is the worft, and still gives me a good deal of pain; observe how it drags on the ground: but as it is not broke, my father fays it will foon be well; and I hope it will be fo, for I leng to be flying, and shall be glad to receive any instructions for the future. I cannot think how I could be fo fcolifhly conceited, as to suppose I knew how to conduct myfelf without my father's guidance.

Why, faid Peckfy, young creatures like us, certainly fland in need of infurction, tion, and ought to think ourselves happy in having parents who are willing to take the trouble of teaching what is necessary for us to know. I dread the day, when I must quit the nest and take care of myself. Flapfy faid, fhe made no doubt' they should know how to fly, and peck, and do every thing before that time; and for her part, the longed to fee the world, and to know how the higher ranks of birds behaved themselves, and what pleasure they enjoyed; and Dicky declared he formed the fame wishes, though he must confels, he had great dread of birds of prey; Oh! faid Flapfy, they will never feize fuch. a pretty creature as you Dicky, I am fure: why if beauty can prevail against cruelty, you will also be secure my sweet fister, replied he, for your delicate engaging shapemift plead in your behalf.

Just as he had finished his speech, a hawk appeared in light, on which the whole party was seized with a most uncommon sensation, and involuntarily threw themselves on their backs, screaming with all their might; and at the same instant the cries of numbers of little birds besides, echoed through the orchard. The Redbreasts soon recovered, and rising on their seet, looked about to see what was become of the cause of their consternation; when they beheld him high in the air, bearing off forme unhappy victin, a few of whole feathers fell near the young family, who on examining them found they belonged to a goldfinch; on which Peckly observed, that it was evident these savages paid no attention to perfonal beauty. Dicky was for terrified he knew not what to do, and had thought of flying back to the nest; but after Robin's missortune, was fearful of offending his father, he therefore got up into a current-bush, and hid himself in the thickest part of the leaves. Flapfy followed him, but Robin being obhged to keep on the ground, Peckly kinds ly resolved to bear him company.

In a few minutes their parents returned from Mr. Benfon's, and found the two latter pretty near where they had left them; but milling the others, the mother with great anxiety enquired what was become of them? Robin then related how they had been frightened with a hawk; and whilst he was doing for they returned to him again.

I am furprised, said the father, that a hawk should venture so near the spot where the gardener was at work. O, said Pecksy, we have not seen him since your left us; then I dare say he is gone to breakfast, replied the mother; and this was the case, for they at this instant saw him return with his shears in his hand, and foon purfue his work. Now you will be safe, cried the father; I shall therefore stay and teach you to fly in different directions, and then your mother and I shall make some little excursions, and leave you to practife by yourselves; but first of all let me shew you where to get water, for I fear you must be very thirsty. No, sid they, we have had several wet worms and juicy caterpillars, which have ferved us both for victuals and drink, Robin is very quick at finding them? There is nothing like necessity to teach birds how to live, faid the father; I am glad Robin's misfortunes have been so beneficial to him. What would have become of you, if you had not exerted yourselves as I directed? faid his mother; you would foon have died, had you continued to lie on the fcorching ground. Remember from this instance as long as you live, that it is better to use means for your own relief, than to spend time in fruitless lamentations.

In respect to Hawks, said the father, they are frightful creatures to be sure; but there are very sew of them in comparison of most other birds, and they can take but one at a time, therefore it is a very great chance whether any of you is that one; your best way will be to keep as near to houses as you can, and make yourselves familiar with mankind, and then I think you will be in little danger. By the way, let me observe, how greatly indebted you are to this good gardener, whom I hope you no longer call a monster. Oh no! said Flapsy, he is a dear good creature. But I was going to fay, cried the father, that at any rate, it would be wrong to make your life unhappy with apprehensions; you cannot keep Hawks away by fearing them; and it is possible, you may never fee another besides; what thousands escape, in comparison of the sew they devour! But come along, Dicky, Flapsy and Pecksy, there is water so near, that Robin can hop fo far: he then cenducted them to a pump, from whence Joe watered the garden, and under its spout, they found an ample supply of that delightful element, more acceptable to them, than the most coffly wine would have been.

Here they staid some time, and were greatly amused; still so near the gardener, that they regarded themselves as under his protection. The parents slew up into a tree, and there the father entertained his beloved mate and samily with his cheerful music; and semetimes they made various airy excursions for examples to their little ones, who all longed to be able to imitate them. In this manner the day passed happily away, and early in the evening Flapsy, Pecksy, and Dicky, were conducted to the nest; they mounted in the air with much more ease than the preceding day, and the parents instructed them how to sly to the branches of some trees which stood near to the ivy wall.

In the mean time they had left Robin by himself, thinking he would be safe, whilst the gardener was moving some grass; but what was the grief of both father and mother when they returned, and could neither fee nor hear him. The gardener too was gone, they therefore apprehended that a cat or rat had taken him away and killed him, yet none of his feathers were to be feen in with the most anxious search, they explored every recess in which they thought it posfible for him to be, and firained their little voices till they were hearfe with calling him, but all in vain; the tool-house was locked; but had he been there, he would have answered; at length quite in despair of finding him, with heavy hearts they returned to the neft; a general lamentation enfued, and this lately happy abode, was now the region of forrow. The father endeavoured to comfort his mate and furviving [129] viving nefflings, and fo far fucceeded, that they resolved to bear their loss with patience.

After a mournful night, the mother left the nest early in the morning, unwilling to relinquish the hope which Rill remained, of finding Robin again; but, having frent an hour in this manner, the returned to her mate, who was comforting his little ones.

Come, faid he, let us take a flight, if we fit lamenting here for ever it will be to no purpose: the evils which befal us must be borne, and the more quietly we submit to them the lighter they will be. If poor Robin is dead, he will fuffer no more; and if he is not, fo much as we fly about, it is a chance but we get tiding; of him; fuppose these little ones attempt to fly with us to your benefactors? If we let out carly and let them rest frequently by the way, I think they may accomplish it. This was very pleasing to every one of the little ones, for they longed to go thither; and accordingly it was determined that they should immediately set out, and they decomplished the journey by easy stages; at length they all arrived in the court, just after the daily penfioners were gone.

Now, faid the father, stop a little, and let me advise you, Dicky, Flapsy, and Pecksy, to behave yourselves properly; hop only where you fee your mother and me hop, and do not meddle with any thing, but what is scattered on purpose. Stay father, faid Dicky, my feathers are fadly rumpled, and fo are mine faid Flapfy. Well, smooth them then, but don't stand finicking for an hour. Peckfy was ready in an inflant, but the others were very tedious, fo their father and mother would wait for them no longer, and flew into the window; the others directly followed them, and to the inexprelfible satisfaction of Master Benson alighted on the tea-table, where they met with a very unexpected pleasure; for who should they find there, as a guest, but the poor loft Robin! The meeting was, you may be fure, a happy one for all parties; and the transports it occasioned, may be easier conceived than described. The father poured forth a loud fong of gratitude; the mother chirped, she bowed her head, clapped her wings, basked on the tea-table, joined her beak to Robin's, then touched the hand of Master Frederick. As for the young ones, they twittered a thouland questions to Rebin; but as he was unwilling to diffurb his father's fong, he defired them to suspend' their their curiofity to another opportunity. But it is now time to fatisfy yours, my young readers, and therefore I shall inform you by what means Robin was placed in this happy fituation.

CHAP. XV.

YOU may remember, that Master Frederick obtained from his mamma a promife, that when the bufiness of daily instruction was finished, he and his fifter should go into the orchard in search of the Robins; as fcon, therefore, as the air was fufficiently cool, the took them with her, and arrived just after the parent birds had taken their young ones back to the nest. Robin was then left by himfelf, and kept hopping about, and fearing no danger, got into the middle of the walk. Frederick descried him at a distance, and cagerly called out, there's one of them, I declare; and before his mamma observed him, he ran to the place and clapped his little hand over it, exulting that he had caught it. The pressure of his hand hurt Robin's wing, who fent forth piteous cries; on which Frederick

Miss Harriet, who saw him catch the bird, ran as fast as possible to prevent his detaining it; and perceived that as Robin hopped away he was lame, on which she concluded that her brother had hurt him; but on Frederick's affuring her, that his wing hung down when he first saw him, Mrs. Benson Taid, it was most likely he was lamed by fome accident, which had prevented his go-.ing with the others to the nest; and if that is the case, said she, it will be humane and charitable to take care of him. Frederick was delighted to hear her fay fo, and asked, whether he might carry it home? Yes, faid his mamma, provided you can take him fafely. Shall I carry him, Madam? faid Joe, he can lie nicely in my hat. This was an excellent scheme, and all parties approved of it; so Frederick took some of the fost grass which was moved down to put at the bottom, and poor Robin was fafely deposited in his vehicle, which served him for a litter; and perceiving into what hands he was fallen, he inwardly rejoiced, knowing that he had an excellent chance of being provided for, as well as of feeing his dear relations again. I need not fay that great care was taken of him, and

and you will eafily suppose he had a more comfortable night than that he had passed in the shed.

When Master and Miss Benson arose the next morning, one of their first cares was to feed the birds, and they had the pleasure to see all their nesslings in a very thriving condition; both the Linnet and the Blackbird now hopped out of their nests to be fed, to the great diversion of Master Frederick: but this pleasure was foon damped by an unlucky accident: for the Blackbird being placed in a window which was open, hopped too near the edge, and fell to the ground, where he was inapped up by a dog, and torn to pieces in an instant. Frederick began to cry as before; but on his fifter's reminding him, that the creature was past the sense of pain, he restrained his tears, and turned his attention to the Linnet, which he put into a cage, that he might not meet the same sate. He then went to feed the flock, and to enquire after Robin, whom Mrs. Benson had taken into her own room, left Frederick should handle and hurt him; to his great joy he found him much better, for he could begin to use his injured wing. Frederick was therefore trusted to carry

For some time the young Redbreasts behaved very well; but at length Dicky, familiarized by the kind treatment he met with, forgot his father's injunctions, and began to hop about in a very rude manner; he even jumped into the plate of bread and butter; and having a mind to tafte the tea, hopped on the edge of a cup, but dipping his foot in the hot liquor, he was glad to make a hasty retreat, to the great diversion of Master Frederick. took the freedom of pecking at the fugar, but found it too hard for her tender beak. For these liberties their mother reproved them, faying, the would never bring them with her again, if they were guilty of fuch rudeness, as to take what was not offered As their longer stay would have broke in on a plan which Mrs. Benson had concerted, the rung her bell, and the footmon came to remove the tea things; on which the old birds, having taken leave of Robin, and promifed to come again the next day, flew out at the window, followed by Dicky, Flapiv, and Peckfy. Rebin was fafely deposited in a cage, and passed a happy day, being often allowed to hop out in order to be sed. The

The parent birds alighted in the court, and conducted their little ones to the water which was fet out for them, after which they all returned to the nest; here the young ones rested till the afternoon, and then their parents took them out in order to shew them the orchard.

CHAP. XVI.

VOU have not yet, faid the father, feen the whole extent of this place, and I wish to introduce you to our neighbours. He then led the way to a peartree, in which a Linnet had built her nest. The old Linnets feemed much pleased to fee their friends the Redbreafts, who with great pride introduced their little family to them. My own neftlings are just ready to fly, faid the hen Linnet, and I hope will make acquaintance with them; for birds fo well influcted as, I make no doubt, your offspring are, must be very definable companions. The little Redbreatts were quite delighted with the hores of having some agreeable friends; and the old ones replied, that they had themf lives received so much pleasure from social friendship, that they wished their young ones to cultivate the same.

They then flew on to a cherry-tree, in which were a pair of Chaffinches in great agitation, endeavouring to part one of their own brood and a young Sparrow, who were engaged in a furious battle; but all in vain, neither of the combatants would defift, till the Chaffinch dropped dead to the ground. His parents were greatly shocked at this accident, on which the cock Redbreast attempted to comfort them with his strains; but finding them deaf to his music, he begged to know the cause of the quarrel, which had had so fatal a conclusion? O! answered the hen Chaffinch, my neftling is loft through his own folly. I cautioned him repeatedly not to make acquaintance with Sparrows, knowing they would lead him into mifchief; but no remonstrance would prevail. As scon as he began to peck about, he formed a friendship with one of that voracious breed, who undertook to teach him to fly and provide for himself; so he left his parents and continually followed the Sparrow, who taught him to steal corn, and other things, and to quarrel with every bird he met; I expected to see him killed centicontinually. At length his companion grew tired of him, and picked a quarrel, which ended as you have feen. However, this is better than if he had been caught by men, and hung up, as I have feen many a bird, for a spectacle, to deter others from stealing. Let me advise you my young friends, said she, addressing herself to the little Redbreasts, to follow your parents direction in every respect, and avoid bad company. She then, accompanied by her mate, slew back to her nest, in order to acquaint the rest of her family with this dreadful catastrophe, and the Redbreasts

They alighted on the ground, and began pecking about, when all of a sudden they heard a strange noise, which rather alarmed the young ones. Their sather desired them to have no sears, but sollow him; he led them to the top of a high tree, in which was a nest of Magpies. They had, the day before, made an excursion round the orchard, and were conversing on what they had seen, but in such a consused manner, that there was no such thing as understanding them; one chattered of one thing, and one of another. In short, all were eager to speak, and none inclined to hear.

What

What a fet of foolish ill-bred little creatures are these, said the cock Redbreast; if they would talk one at a time, what each says might afford entertainment to the rest; but by chattering all together in this manner, they are quite disagreeable. Take example from them, my nest-lings, and avoid the fault which renders them so ridiculous.

So faying, he flew on, and they foon faw a Cuckow, furrounded by a number of birds, who had been pecking at her till she had scarce a feather left upon her breaft, whilst she kept repeating her own dull note, Cuckow! Cuckow! inceffantly. Get back again to your own country, faid a Thrush; what business have you in ours, fucking the eggs, and taking the nests of any birds you meet with? Surely it would be fufficient, could you have the privilege of building for yourfelf, as we do who are natives; but you have no right to feize upon our labours, and devour our offspring. The Cuckow deferves his fate, faid the hen Redbreaft. Though I am far from bearing enmity to foreign birds in general, I deteft fuch characters as his. I wonder mankind do not drive Currows away; but I suppose, it is OIL on account of their being the harbingers of fummer.

How different is the character of the Swallow; he comes here to enjoy the mildness of the climate, and confers a benefit on the land by destroying many noxious infects. I rejoice to fee that race sporting in the air, and have had high pleasure in converling with them; for as they are great travellers, they have much to relate.

But come, let us go on.

They foon came to a hollow free, peep into this hole, faid the cock bird to his young ones; they did fo; and beheld a neft of young Owls. What a fet of ugly creatures, faid Dicky; furely you do not intend to shew your frightful faces in the world! Did ever any one fee fuch dull eyes, and fuch a frightful muffle of fea-

Whoever you are that reproach us with a want of beauty, you do not shew your own good sense, replied one of the little Owls. Perhaps we may have qualities which render us as amiable as yourselves. You do not appear to know that we are Night, and not Day birds. The quantity of feathers in which we are muffled up, are very comfortable to us when we are out in the cold; and I can shew you a pair of eyes, which,

which, if you are little birds, will frighten you out of your wits; and if I could fly, I would let you fee what else I could do. He then drew back the film which was given him, that the strong light of the day might not injure his fight, and stared full at Dicky, who was struck with assonishment.

At that instant the parent Owl returned, and feeing a parcel of strangers looking into her neft, she set up a screeching, which made the whole party take wing. As foon as they flopped to rest, the cock Redbreaft, who was really frightened as well as his mate and family, recollected himself, and cried out, Well, Dicky, how did you like the Owl's eyes? I fancy they proved brighter than you expected; but had they even been as ugly as you supposed, it was very rude and filly in you to notice it. You ought never to censure any bird for natural deformities, fince no one contracts them by choice; and what appears difagreeable to you, may be pleasing in the eyes of another. Besides, you should be particularly careful not to infult strangers, because you cannot know their deserts, nor what power they may have of revenging themselves. You may think yourself happy if you never meet one of these Owls by by night, for I affure you they often feed upon little birds like us; and you have no reason to think they will spare you, after the affront you have given them. But come, let us fly on.

They foon alighted on a tree, in which was a Mock-Bird *, who, instead of finging any note of his own, kept fuccesfively imitating those of every bird that inhabited the orchard, and this with a view of making them ridiculous. If any one had any natural imperfection in his finging, he was fure to mimic it; or if any was particularly attentive to the duties of his station, he ridiculed him as grave and formal. The young Redbreafts were excessively diverted with this droll creature; but their father defired them to confider, whether they should like to hear him mimic them? Every one agreed, that they should be very angry to be ridiculed in that manner. Then, replied the father, neither encourage nor imitate him. The Mock-Bird hearing him, took up his notes, "Neither encourage nor imitate him," faid he. The cock Redbreaft on this flew at him with fury, plucked some feathers from his breast, and sent him screaming from the place. I have made you sing a Natural note at last, said he, and hope you will take care how you practise Mimickry again. His mate was sorry to see him disturb his temper, and russe his feathers, for such an insignificant creature; but he told her it was particularly necessary as an example to his nestlings, as Mimickry was a fault to which young birds were too apt to incline; and he wished to shew them the danger they exposed themselves; to in the practice of it.

The whole Redbreaft family refted themfelves for fome time; and whilft they fat still, observed a Chassinch slying from tree to tree, chattering to every bird he had any knowledge of; and his discourse seemed to affect his hearers greatly, for they perceived some birds flying off in great haste, and others meeting them; many battles and disputes ensued. The little Redbreasts wondered at these circumstances; at length Peckfy enquired the meaning of the buftle. This Chaffinch, replied the father, is a Telltale; it is inconceivable the mischief he makes. Not that he has so much malice in his nature, but he loves to hear himself chatter; and therefore every anecdote he can collect he tells to all he meets, by which means he often raises quarrels and animosities; neither does he stop here, for he frequently invents the tales he relates.

As the Redbreast was speaking, the Chassinch alighted on the same tree. O, my old friend, said he, are you got abroad in the world again? I heard the Linnet in the pear-tree say, you were caught stealing corn, and hung up as a spectacle, but I thought this could not be true; besides, the Blackbird in the cherry-tree told me, that the reason we did not see you as usual was, that you were rearing a family, to whom, he said, you were so severe, that the poor little creatures had no comfort of their lives.

Whatever you may have heard, or whatever you may fay, is matter of indifference to me, replied the Redbreast; but as a neighbour, I cannot help advising you to restrain your tongue a little, and consider, before you communicate your intelligence, whether what you are going to say has not a tendency to disturb the peace of society.

Whilst he was thus advising him, a slock of birds assembled about the tree; it consisted of those to whom the Chassinch had been chattering, who having come to an expla-explanation with each other, had detected his falsities, and determined to expel him the orchard; which they did, with every mark of contempt and ignominy: all the Redbreafts joined in the pursuit, for even the little ones faw his character in a detestable light, and formed a determination to avoid his fault. When the tell-tale was gone, the party which purfued him alighted all together in the same walk, and amongst them the Redbreasts discovered many of their old friends, with whom they now renewed their acquaintance, knowing they should soon be released from family cares; and the young ones passed a happy day in this cheerful affembly: but at length the hour of repose approached, when each individual fled to his resting-place; and the Redbreasts, after so fatiguing a day, fell afleep.

View wire was a most mainble worser

As foon as the breakfast things were removed at Mrs. Benson's, she informed her son and daughter, that she intended to take them with her to Farmer Wilson's, where she made no doubt they would pass a happy day; and desired them go and get equipped for the journey, whilst she dressed herself. The young folks obeyed without hesitation, and having given their maid very strict injunctions to feed Robin and the Linnet, they attended their mamma to the coach; and after a delightful ride arrived at the farm-house, where they were received with the utmost respect by Mrs. Wilson.

Farmer Wilson was a very worthy man, possessed of a great share of natural good sense and benevolence of heart. He had, by his industry, acquired sufficient to purchase the farm he lived on, and had a fair prospect of making a comfortable provision for a numerous family, whom he brought up with the greatest care, and taught them all to be merciful to the cattle which were employed in his bufiness.

His wife was a most amiable woman, and had received a good education from her father, who was formerly Curate of the parish. This good man had strongly implanted in his daughter's mind the Christian doctrine of UNIVERSAL CHARITY, which she exercised, not only towards the human species, but also extended it to poultry, and every living creature which it was her province to manage.

Mrs. Benson knew that her children would here have an opportunity of seeing many different animals treated with propriety; and it was on this account that she took them with her, though she herself complied with an invitation she had received the day before, and visited these good people from a motive of sincere re-

As foon as they were seated, Mrs. Wilfon regaled her young guests with a piece of nice cake, made by her daughter Betsy, a little girl of twelve years old, who sat by, enjoying with a secret delight, the honour which the little Lady and Gentleman did to her performance. It happened fortunately to be a cool day, and Mrs. Benson expressed a desire to walk about and see the sam.

In the first place, Mrs. Wilson shewed her the house, which was in every respect perfectly neat, and in compleat order. She then took her guest into her dairy, which was well stored with milk and cream, butter and cheese. From hence they went to visit the poultry-yard, where the little Bensons were excessively delighted indeed; for there were a number of cocks and hens, and many broods of young chickens, besides turkies and Guinea hens.

All the fowls expressed the greatest joy at the fight of Mrs. Wilson and her daughter Betfy; the cocks celebrated their arrival by loud and cheerful crowings; the hens gave notice of their approach by cackling, and affembled their infant train to partake of their bounty; the turkies and Guinea fowls ran to meet them; a number of pigeons also alighted from a pigeonhouse. Betsy scattered amongst them the grain which she carried in her lap for the purpose, and seemed to have great pleasure in distributing it. When their young vifitors were fatisfied with feeing the poultry fed, Mrs. Wilson shewed them the hen-house, and other conveniencies provided for them, which were excellently calculated to make their lives comfortable; and then opened a little door, which led led to a meadow, where the fowls were often indulged to ramble and refresh themselves. On seeing her approach this place the whole party collected, and ran into the meadow, like a troop of school-boys into their play-ground.

You, Mrs. Wilion, and your daughter, must have great amusement with these pretty creatures, faid Mrs. Benfon. We have indeed, Madam, and great profit too; for they furnish us with a vast number of eggs and chickens, not only for our own use, but for the market also. And can you prevail on yourfelf to kill these sweet creatures? faid Miss Benson. Indeed, Miss, I cannot, faid Mrs. Wilson, and never did kill a chicken in my life; but it is an easy matter to find people capable of doing it; and there is an absolute necessity for some of them to die, for they breed fo fast, that in a short time we should have more than we could possibly feed: but I make it a rule to render their lives as happy as possible, and never shut them up to fatten any longer than I can help, use no cruel methods of cramming them, nor confine them in a fituation where they can fee other fowls at liberty; neither do I take the chickens from the hen till she herself deferts them, nor fet hens upon ducks eggs.

Toften regret, faid Mrs. Benson, that so many lives should be facrificed to preserve ours; but we must eat animals, or they would at length eat us, at least all that would otherwise support us.

Whilit this conversation passed, Master Frederick had followed the fowls into the meadow, where the turkey-cock, taking him for an enemy, had attacked him, and frightened him so much, that he cried out for help: Betsy Wilson ran to his assistance, and soon calmed his fears.

The farmer's wife next proposed (but with many apologies for offering to take them to fuch a place) to shew them her pig-sties. The name of a pig-sty generally conveys an idea of nastiness, but whoever had feen those at Farmer Wilfon's, would have had a very different one. They were neatly paved, and washed down every day; the troughs in which they fed were frequently scoured, and the water they drank was always fweet and wholefome. The pigs themselves had an appearance of neatness, which no one could have expected in fuch kind of animals; and though they had not the ingenuity of the learned pig, there was really fomething intelligent in their gruntings, and a very droll arch expression in the eyes of some of

of them. They knew their benefactors, and found means of testifying their joy at seeing them; which was increased when a boy, whom Mrs. Wilson had ordered to bring some bean-shells, emptied his basket before them. Now a contest ensued who should have the largest share, and each began pushing the other aside, and stuffing as fast as he could, lest they should have more than himself.

Miss Benson said she could not bear to fee fuch greediness. It is indeed, replied Mrs. Benson, very difagreeable, even in fuch creatures as these, but how much more fo in the human species; and yet how frequent is this fault amongst children in particular? Pray look at these pigs, Frederick, and tell me, if you never remember to have met with a little boy who eat strawberries as these pigs do bean-shells? Frederick's cheeks at this question were covered with conscious blushes; on which mamma kindly kiffed him, and faid, the hoped he had feen enough of greediness to-day, to serve him for a lessen as long as he lived.

In a separate sty was a sow with a litter of young pigs. This was a very pleasing sight indeed to Master Frederick, who longed to have one of them to play with;

but Mrs. Wilson told him it would make the sow very angry, and her gruntings would terrify him as much as the turkeycock had done; on which he dropped his request, but said he should like to keep such a little creature.

If it would always continue little, Frederick, faid Mrs. Benson, it would do very well; but it will perhaps grow as large as its mother, and what shall we do then? Familiarized by the kind treatment which I am sure you would give it, we should have it following you into the parlour, and perhaps run grunting after you into your bed-chamber. I myself knew an instance of a person who nursed up a sick pig, which actually ran after her to church, and became the most troublesome thing you can conceive.

I suppose your hogs are very profitable as well as your poultry, Mrs. Wilson? Yes, Madam, replied she, we cure a good deal of bacon, and picklea quantity of pork; we sell a great many sucking pigs, so that we are well paid for keeping them; and I never suffer them to be neglected in any particular, and have the pleasure of thinking, sew pigs are happier than mine. in the garden? With all my heart, faid Mrs. Benfon.

Mrs. Wilson then conducted her guests into a garden, which abounded with all kinds of vegetables for the table, quantities of fruit, and a variety of flowers. Master Frederick longed to taste some of the delicacies which presented themselves to his eye, but he had been taught never to gather fruit or flowers without leave, hor alk for any: however, Mrs. Willon, with his mamma's permission, treated him and his fifter with some fine apples and pears, which Betfy gathered and presented in cabbage leaves, and then took them to a shady arbour, where they fat and enjoyed their feast. After which they went to fee the bees, who were at work in glasshives.

CHAP. XVIII.

THIS fight of the bees was a great entertainment, not only to the children, but to Mrs. Benson also, who was excefsively pleased with the ingenuiety and industry with which these insects collected their their honey and wax, formed their cells, and deposited their store. She had, by books, acquired a knowledge of the natural history of bees, which enabled her to examine their work with much greater fatisfaction, than she would have received from the fight of them, had she been only taught to consider them as little stinging creatures, whom it was dangerous to approach. This is quite a treat to me indeed, faid she to Mrs. Wilson, for I never before had an opportunity of feeing bees work in glafshives. Why, Madam, faid the good woman, few will be at the expence of them; and indeed my neighbours laugh at me, and call me very whimfical and extravagant for indulging myself with them; but I find my account in keeping bees thus, even upon a principle of œconomy; for as I do not destroy them, I have greater numbers to work for me, and more honey every year than the last, notwithstanding I feed my bees in the winter. I have made acquaintance with the queen of every hive, who will come to me whenever I call her, and you shall see one of their majesties if you pleafe.

On this she called, in a manner to which the inhabitants of the hive they were looking at, were accustomed to, and a large bee soon settled on her hand; in an inflant after she was covered, from head to foot, with bees. Miss Benson was quite terrified, lest they should sting, and Frederick ran crying away; but Mrs. Wilson affured them the little creatures would not do any mischief, if no one attempted to catch them. Bees are, in their natural difpositions, very harmless creatures, I assure you, Mafter Benson, said she; though I own they will certainly sting little boys who endeavour to catch them in order to fuck their bag of honey, or take out their sting: but you see, that though I have hundreds about me, and even on my face and arms, not one offers to do me an injury; and I believe the wasps seldom sting but in their own She then threw up her hand, which the queen bee regarded as a fignal of dismission, and slew away in great state, furrounded by her guards, and followed by the rest of her subjects, each ready to lose his own life in the defence of her's.

There is something very wonderful, said Mrs. Benson, in the strong attachment these little creatures have to their sovereign, and very instructive too. I wish our good King could see all his subjects so closely united in his interest! What say you, Frederick, would you fight for your

King? Yes, mamma, if papa would--That I affure you, my dear, he certainly would do, if there were occasion, as loyally as the beit Bee in the world; and I beg you will remember what I now tell you as long as you live: That it is your duty to love your King, for he is to be confidered as the father of his country. But, mamma, faid Frederick, it is the Queen that the Bees love, and we have a queen too. Yes, my dear, we have so; and I believe her majefty is as much honoured by her subjects as a queen bee in her hive, though she has not fo full a command over them; for it is a king that governs England as your papa governs his family, and the queen is to be confidered as the mother of the country. But before we take our leave of the bees, let me observe to you, my dears, that several instructive lessons may be taken from their example. If fuch little infects as thefe perform their daily tasks with so much alacrity, furely it must be a shame for children to be idle, and to fret, because they are put to learn things which will be of the utmost consequence to them in the end; and which would indeed conduce to their present happiness, would they but apply to them with a willing mind. Science

Science of various kinds prefents itself to the human race, as the different flowers offer themselves to bees; and nothing is wanting to extract the fweets, but an application of those faculties of which they are by nature possessed. As the industrious bee flies successively to every fragrant plant within his reach, so do you, my dear children, go from one branch of knowledge toanother: but observe, the bee does not fly giddily from flower to flower, merely to take a transient view of its beauties, he rests on each, till he has obtained all that will answer his purpose: imitate him in this particular also, and be not hurried on, by vain curiofity, from book to book, fo as to gain only a superficial knowledge in the different parts of your education; but remember, that the bee applies the materials he collects to purpofes valuable to himself, and to the community to which he belongs.

But come, Mrs. Willon, we must, if you please, think of retiring from this place; for if we stay here much longer, we shall not have time to enjoy the pleasures you have in reserve for us. On this Mrs. Wilfon said, she was ready to wait on them.

As they walked along, Miss Benson took notice of a variety of beautiful insects, and Frederick Frederick fo far forgot himfelf, as to run after a moth and catch it; but his mamma -obliged him to let it go immediately. Don't you think, Mrs. Wilson, said she, that it is very wrong to let children catch -butterflies and moths? Indeed I do, Madam, replied the good woman. Poor little creatures, what injury can they do us by flying about? In that flate at least they are harmless to us. Caterpillars and snails, it is true, we are obliged frequently to destroy, on account of their devouring fruit and vegetables; but unless they abound fo as to be likely to do a real injury, I never let them be meddled with. I often think of my good father's maxim, which was, "Never to take away the life of any creature, unless it was necessary for the benefit of mankind." "Whilst there is food and room enough in the world for them and us, let them live and enjoy the bleflings they were formed for," he would fay.

When I was a little girl, said Mrs. Benfon, I had a great propensity to catching slies and other insects, but my father had an excellent microscope, in which he shewed me a number of different objects; by this means I learnt, that even the minutest creatures might be as susceptible of pain as thing to death, without fancying I hear its bones crack, and that I fee its blood gushing from its veins and arteries; and so far from having a pleasure in killing even the disagreeable infects which are trouble-some in houses, I assure you I cannot do it myself, nor see it done without pain; and yet they certainly may be considered as enemies, and as such we have a right to destroy them.

To be fure, Madam, faid Mrs. Wilson, for without cleanliness we could not enjoy health. It goes against me to demolish a fine spider's web, and yet they make a house look very dirty; but I seldom have any in mine, for I took care, when I first came to live in it, to destroy the nests, and the old spiders, finding there was no security for their young ones here, have sortaken the house; and I am inclined to think, that the same vigilance in respect to other disagreeable insects, would have the same effect.

Doubtless, said Mrs. Benson; but pray tell me, do you destroy the webs of garden spiders also? Not unless there are so many as to be troublesome and disagreeable, replied Mrs. Wilson. I should not myself like to have the fruits of my industry dedemolished, molifhed, nor my littles ones taken out of my arms, or from their warm beds, and crushed to death. I am of opinion, said Mrs. Benson, that it would be a good way to accustom one's felf, before one kills any thing, to change situations with it in ima-

For instance, if I accidentally disturb an ant's nest, instead of crushing the little creatures with thoughtless inhumanity, as a set of inlignificant atoms, I can fancy thern appearing to me of the same magnitude a microscope would shew them, and one of them addressing me in this manner: "Step aside, I entreat you, and let me and my affociates pass in safety, that we may repair the mischief you have done to our city. The magazine of corn is fallen ir. and I fear my dear parents are buried in the ruins; I hear the lamentations of my mate for the danger of our little ones; and beheld two of my dear friends, whom you have trod upon, in the agonies of death. Why do you treat with fuch barbarity a fet of innocent beings, who have never wilfully done you the least injury? Do we ever fling the human race but in our own defence? Do you really want the fruit we eat? And can the finall quantity of corn we heard up be milled from your H 2 plentiful plentiful stores? Is it not misfortune enough for us, that we are the prey of birds, but must mankind, to whom thousands of us would not afford even a fingle meal, deftroy us for fport? Oh! rather ye, whose hearts are alive to the fentiments of humanity, plead our cause to the thoughtless part of your own species, and, as lords of the creation, drive away from us those natural enemies, which you may fee darting down to devour us! If you love your own offspring, think of ours; if you would be prosperous in your own occupations, protect those who afford a lesson of industry, which the wifest of mankind has recemmended to your ferious confideration."

Indeed, Madam, faid Mrs. Wilfen, I have often wished that poor dumb creatures had semebody to speak for them; many an innocent life would then be saved, which is now destroyed to no end.

Well, said Harriet, I am sure I shall never kill any thing, without first magnifying it in my mind, and thinking what it would say for itself if able to speak. Then, my dear, I will engage for you, replied her mamma, that you will put but very sew creatures to death: but in order to have a proper notion of their form, and to be capable of making these ideal speeches, you you must study Natural History; from whence you will learn, how wonderful their construction is; how carefully and tenderly the inferior creatures provide for their young; how ingenious their various employments are; how far they are from harbouring malice against the human species; and how excellently they are inform. ed and instructed by their great Creator, for the enjoyment of happiness in their different classes of existence, which happiness we have certainly no right wantonly to diffurb. Besides, it is really a meanness to destroy any creature merely because it is little; and in children, particularly abfurd to do fo; for, upon this principle, they must themselves expect to be constantly ill-treated; though no animal stands more in need of tenderness than they do for many years, from the time of their coming into the world: and even men and women might expect to be annihilated, by the power of the great CREATOR.

Neither do I know how we can precifely call any thing great or little, fince it is only so by comparing it with others. An ant or fly may appear to one of its own species, whose eyes are formed to see those parts which we cannot discover without glisses, as considerable as men and women do to each other: and to creatures of the dimensions of a mite, one the size of an ant doubtless looks formidable and gigantic. I therefore think it but justice to view insects with microscopic eyes, before we commit cruel devastations among them.

During this conversation Master Frederick kept running about, making choice of flowers, which Betsy Wilson gathered and formed into nosegays for his mamma, his

CHAP. XIX.

THE next place Mrs. Wilson took her guests to was a sarm-yard, in which was a large horse-pond. Here her young visitors were delighted with the appearance of a number of geese and ducks; some were swimming in the water, some diving, others rooting in the mud to see what fish or worms they could find.

It appears very strange to me, said Miss Benson, that any creatures can take delight in making themselves so dirty: and yet, replied Mrs. Benson, how many children do the same, without having any excuse for fearch of the necessaries of life; but I have feen boys do it merely for diversion, and sometimes at the hazard of their lives.

Very true, Madam, faid Mrs. Wilson; my little Neddy had like to have been-drowned, no longer ago than last Monday. He is a little venturesome rogue, and runs through thick and thin when pleasure is in view; but I fancy he will not hunt ducks about any more: for my part, I do not like any of my children should make sport of teazing animals. I wish every creature I keep to enjoy happiness to the day of its death, and when it must be killed, to have it dispatched by the quickest means possible.

Have you any fish here? said Frederick. I believe none of any consequence, Sir; the ducks and geese would take care that none should grow to any considerable size; but there are plenty in a pond which you will see in the next field, and I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you, at dinner, cat of some perch which were caught there. Sometimes we catch fine carp and tench, but only with nets; for neither my good man nor I can bear the cruel diversion of angling; nor do we allow our children to follow it, from a notion that it hardens the heart, and leads to idleness.

Pray, mamma, faid Miss Harriet, is it right to catch fish? I should think, as they live in water, and we upon land, we have no business with them. You would wish every one then, my dear, to keep to their own element? Your fentiment is a good one in many respects, but it must not be extended fo far as to forbid the catching of fish. Man has dominion over the fish, as well as over beafts and fowls, and many of them are excellent food for mankind; and the aftonishing increase of them shews that they are designed to be so; for were all that are spawned to grow to full fize, there would foon be more than our ponds, or even than the fea itself would hold, and they would be starved; therefore there are the same reasons for our feeding on them as on poultry, but we should be very careful to dispatch them as quickly as possible.

Some people are cruel enough to reaft lobsters alive, whose cries I have been told are dreadful to hear; and others will flay cels alive, then put them without their skins into a pail of cold water, and afterwards cut them in pieces, and throw them into a frying-pan of boiling sat, where sometimes every separate piece will wreath about in agony.

agony. Thus each poor fish suffers as many deaths as it is divided into pieces. Now, Harriet, this cannot be right, how ever authorized by custom; therefore I hope you never will suffer such things to be done in your kitchen when you keep house, but always give orders that your lobsters be put into boiling water, which kills them soon, and that your eels are knocked on the head before they are skinned. This is dreadful enough, though little in comparison of what they suffer by the other methods.

Oh! mamma, faid Harriet, you make me even shudder; I do not believe I shall ever defire to eat eels; I shall be ready to make speeches for every piece as it lies in a dish before me. But pray tell me, is it cruel to kill frogs and toads? Ask Mrs. Wilson, my dear, she has more to do with fuch reptiles than I have. Why Miss, replied Mrs. Wilson, I am very singular in regard to fuch kind of creatures; and though I by no means like to have them in my house, do not make an outery, and condemn every one to a violent death which is accidentally found in my cellars, or other places; on the contrary, I genegally fee it thrown into a ditch at some distance to take its charce. There are many many birds and water-fowl that feed on young frogs and toads, which will in general keep them from multiplying, fo as to be nuisances to us; and it is time enough for us to take arms against them, if there happens to be a very extraordinary increase of them. My good man is as particular in respect to moles; if he finds them in his garden, or any other part of his grounds where they can do mischief, he has them killed, but never fuffers them to be molested when they are harmless. Neither does he hunt, or permit any one belonging to him to hunt after fnakes; for he fays, that if they are not diffurbed, they will not come from their haunts to annoy us; and to kill, for the fake of killing, is cruel.

Pray, Mrs. Wilson, said Frederick, do your sons ever go a birds-nessing? They had better not let me know it, if they do, said she. No, Sir, I hope I have not a child amongst my family capable of such barbarity. In the course of the summer they generally have young birds to nurse, who sall out of the nest, or lose their parents, but are seldom lucky enough to raise them; and we have only one in a cage which they reared last summer. Yet we have plenty of singing; for the sweet creatures, finding they may enjoy themselves unmolested in the trees, treat us with their harmony from morning to night, of which you had a specimen in the garden. Sparrows, indeed, my husband is under the neceffity of deftroying, for they are fuch devourers, they would leave him but little corn to carry to market if he did not shoot them; but he never kills the Crows, because they are very serviceable in picking up grubs, and other things injurious to farmers; we only fet a little boy to watch our new-fown grain, who keeps making a noise, which effectually frightens them. O! faid Frederick, I nurse young birds too. I have got a Linnet and a Robin Redbreast, and feed an hundred beside.

Mrs. Wilson smiled, and turning away to Mrs. Benson, said, Now, Madam, we will, if you please, return to the house, for I fancy by this time dinner is nearly ready, and my husband and sons are about com-

Mrs. Benson was a little tired with her ramble, and was really impatient to see Farmer Wilson and the rest of his amiable family. When she drew near the house she was met by the worthy man, who gave her a most cordial welcome, and said he was proud to see so much good company. Nancy,

Nancy, the eldest daughter, to whom the mother had entrusted the care of inspecting the additional cookery which she had ordered, and who for that reason was not to be feen in the morning, now made her appearance, dreffed with the most perfect neatness; health bloomed in her cheeks, and cheerfulness and good-humour sparkled in her eyes. With this engaging countenance fhe eafily prevailed on Master Frederick to let her place him by her on the table, round which the two other visitors, the mafter and miffress of the house, and the rest of their offspring, consisting of Thomas, a fine youth of eighteen, four younger boys, and little Betsy, were soon feated.

The table was covered with plain food, but by the good management of Nancy, who had made an excellent pudding, an apple-pie, and fome delicious custards, it made a very good figure; and Mrs. Benson afterwards often declared, that she had never enjoyed an entertainment so much. It was considerably heightened by the happy countenances of the whole family. The farmer, who was a jocose man, said a number of droll things, which diverted his little visitors very much, and soon after dinner he begged leave to depart, as he was sheep-shearing; thearing; but faid, he thought the young gentlefolks might be diverted with the light, to invited them to pay him a vifit in the field, and left Joe and Neddy to conduct Master Frederick.

CHAP. XX.

THE young farmers were rather shy at first, being afraid that their guests would laugh at their country talk; but when they observed how politely they behaved to their fifters, they entered into conversation, and told Master Benson anhundred particulars about animals, with which he was before unacquainted; and he in return told all he knew about his Redbreafts and other pensioners. They then shewed him a pretty cat with kittens, and a bitch with two young puppies; the latter were kept in a kennel, and the cat in a stable, where they were well supplied with food. As Frederick knew that his fifter was remarkably fond of cats, he stepped back to call her to look at these, which, with her mamma's permission, she was greatly pleafed to do, and longed to have the kittens to nurse. When she returned, she enquired whether the dogs and cats were ever permitted to come into the house? Not whilst they have young ones, said Mrs. Wilson, for they make a great deal of dirt, and are very troublesome at that time; but when puss has brought up her family, which is defigned for the stable, she shall be admitted amongst us again; for she is a very useful creature, and deferves to be well treated, but I'do not fuffer my children to handle her; I think it looks very ugly for any one to be all over fcratches. Daphne is admitted to a greater share of familiarity; the is very faithful, and extremely good-natured, but we never feed her in the house, for there is no doing so without greafing the floors.

I am of opinion, said Mrs. Ben'on, that a difference should be made between our treatment of cats and dogs. There is something very savage in the nature of the former; and though they certainly are deserving of our kindness on account of their usefulness, yet they cannot make themselves so agreeable as dogs; and there is really something very formidable in their talons and teeth; and when en aged, a cat is no better than a little tygress. Besides, were there not danger to one's self in nursing cats, there is no doing it without injury to one's linen; for when puss is best pleased, she generally tramples with her talons unsheathed, by which practice many a nice apron has been torn. And even the cleanliness of cats is injurious, for they usually have recourse to corners of chairs, in order to rub the dirt from their talons. Many people have a great dread of this animal, and on that account it should not be used to come into rooms in which a variety of company is received.

As for dogs, they are in general to very focial, grateful, and pleafing, that they feem formed to be the humble companions of mankind; and if kept in proper order, may be familiarized with fafety; but then they should be well educated, and taught to know their distance. And as there are different species of them, we should make a prudent selection, and not introduce into the house great mastiss or tall greyhounds a neither must we indulge those we domesticate to too great a degree, for in that case they will become as troublesome as cats.

Mrs. Benson now expressed her desire to fee the sheep-shearing; on which Mrs. Wilson and her daughter conducted her and Miss Harriet to the field, where they arrived at the conclusion of the operation; and a very pleafing fight it was to behold the happy creatures, who lately waddled under a heavy, heating load, relieved from their burthen, leaping and frisking with delight, whilst the accumulated wool seemed, as it lay, to promife comfortable clothing for many a naked wretch among the human species, who, destitute of such a supply, would be in danger of perishing with cold in the ensuing winter. Miss Harriet observed the innocent countenances of the sheep and lambs, and said she thought it was a thousand pities to kill them. It is so, my dear, faid her mamma, but we must not indulge our feelings too far in respect to animals which are given us for food; all we have to do is to avoid barbarity. It is happy for them that they have no apprehension of being killed, and therefore enjoy life in peace and fecurity to the very last; and even when the knife is lifted to their throats, are ignorant of its destination; and when the fatal blow is once struck, a few struggles put an end to their pain for ever. But come, Mrs. Wilson, will you favour us with a fight of your cows. With pleasure, Madam, they are by this time driven up to be milked. She then conducted her vifiters towards the farm-yard.

Perhaps, Madam, faid Mrs. Wilson, as they walked along, the young Lady and Gentleman may be afraid of horned cattle? I believe, replied Mrs. Benson, I may venture to fay, that Harriet has no unreasonable fears of any living creature; it has been my endeavour to guard the minds of my children against so distressing a weakness; but whether Frederick's heart has acquired fortitude enough to enable him to venture near fo many cows, I cannot tell. O yes, mamma, cried Frederick, I would fooner get up and ride into the yard on the horns of one of them, than run away. Well, we shall foon put your courage to the proof, faid Mrs. Benson; so come along, Sir.

As for my children, said Mrs. Wilson, they are remarkably courageous in respect to animals; all the creatures belonging to us are very harmless and gentle, which is the natural consequence of kind treatment, and no person need be afraid of walking in any part of our grounds: but it is difficult to persuade some people that there is no danger, for they are apt to imagine, that every loose horse they see will gallop over them, and that every creature with horns will gore and toss them. Very true, replied Mrs. Bensen; and I have known many as much afraid of a toad, a frog, or a spider, as if certain death would be the consequence of meeting them; when if these persons would but make use of their reason, they would soon be convinced, that fuch fears are ill grounded. Frogs and toads are very harmless creatures, and so far from offering an injury to any human being they may chance to meet, hop away with all possible expedition, from a dread of being themselves destroyed; and spiders drop fuddenly down, with a view to their own preservation only; and therefore it is highly ridiculous to be afraid of them. Hories and oxen are much more formidable creatures; they certainly could do us a great deal of mischief, if they were conscious of their superior strength; but Providence has wifely ordained that they should not be fo; and having given mankind dominion over them, has implanted in their natures an awe and dread of the human species, which occasion them to yield subjection to the Lords of the creation, when they exert their authority in a proper manner. It is really a very wonderful thing, Mrs. Wilson, to see a fine lively horse submitting to the bit and harness, or a droveof oxen quietly marching under the direction of one man!

Pray, mamma, faid Harriet, what do you mean by faying, that Man is LORD of the Creation? Are all brute creatures subject to every man? I cannot comprehend how this can be. I will endeavour to explain it to you, my dear, faid Mrs. Benson, the next time we read the Bible together; at present, I have only time to inform you, that the dread of mankind, which prevails fo generally amongst the inferior creatures, does not exist in so high a degree, as to render every individual animal afraid of every individual man: but the human species, that is to say, all mankind together, have an undoubted superiority and dominion: and there is no species of animals, which, if collected together, mankind could not subdue; for though inferior to many of them in firength, men vaftly exceed them in number, and having the use of reason, can employ a variety of means to conquer them: and I make no doubt, that was the experiment possible, to assemble each individual species, in opposition to the whole race of mankind which exist at onetime upon the earth, or even an equal number of them, the dread and fear which is instinctive in their natures, would operate fo powerfully on the hearts of the most ferocious-ferocious of them, as to prevent their attempting any contest.

It is observable, and shews at once the goodness and wisdom of our great CREATOR, that those creatures, which are the most useful to us, are the easiest tamed; and yield, not only singly, but in stocks, to mankind, nay, even to boys.

From what I have faid you must perceive, that it is a great weakness for a human being to be afraid of animals.

By this time the party were advanced pretty near to the farm-yard, and Frederick espied one of the cows peeping over the gate; on which, with a countenance expressive of fear, he ran hastily to his mamma and asked her, Whether cows could tols people over gates and hedges? I will not answer so filly a question, Frederick, said the; pray look again, and you will perceive, that it is impossible for such large heavy creatures to do fo; and these inclofures are made on purpose to confine them within proper bounds. But did not you boast just now, that you could ride on the horns of one of them? That I shall not require you to do, for it would very likely make the creature angry, because cows are not accustomed to carry any load upon their heads; neither would I allow you to run after them with a stick, or to make any attempt to frighten them; but if you approach as a friend, I make no doubt you will be received as such; so summon your courage and attend us, the cows will not hurt you, I can affure you.

Neddy Wilson then began laughing, from the idea that a boy should be afraid of a cow! which made Frederick ashamed of himself; and quitting his mamma's gown, by which he had held fast whilst she was speaking, he laid hold of Neddy's hand, and declared his refolution to go as near the cows as he would. I will not take upon me to fay, that his little heart was perfectly free from palpitation; but that lay in his own bosom, where none could discover its feelings but himself; so let us give him credit for as much courage as we can, and acknowledge him to be a noble little fellow, in thus trufting himfelf amongst a number of horned cattle,

CHAP. XXI.

HE whole party now entered the farmyard, where they faw eight fine cows, fat, fleek, and beautifully clean, who yielded feveral pails of rich milk, the steam of which, which, added to the breath of the cows, cast a delightful fragrance around. Mrs. Wilson then entreated her company to return to the house, where tea was provided, and a delicious syllabub.

The farmer now came back, and refreshed himself with a cup of ale, which was very comfortable after the fatigues of the day.

I have had, faid Mrs. Benson, great pleafure in viewing your farm, Mr. Wilson, which appears to me to afford all the defirable comforts and conveniencies of life, and I most sincerely wish a continuance of your prosperity. If it is not an impertinent question, pray tell me did you inherit it from your father, or was it purchased with the fruits of your own industry?

10

Neither my wife nor I have led an idle life, I assure you, Madam, replied the farmer; but, next to the blessing of heaven, I think myself in a great degree indebted to my cattle for my good success. My father lest me master of a little farm, with a few acres of land well cropped, three horses, two cows, six sheep, a sow and pigs, a jack-ass, and a few poultry; these have gradually multiplied to what you now see me possess, besides numbers that I have fold and I have had fine crops of hay and corn;

corn; fo that every year I laid by a little money, till I was able to purchase this farm, which is as good a one as any man should desire.

There is something so uncommon in hearing a farmer attribute a part of his success in life to his cattle, that I should be obliged to you, Mr. Wilson, said the Lady, if you would account to me for this circumstance. Most readily, Madam, said he.

When I was a very young man, I heard a -fine fermon from the pulpit, preached by my dear wife's father, on the fubject of shewing mercy to brutes, which made a great impression on my mind; and I have ever fince acted towards all dumb creatures, as I would to mankind, upon the principle of doing as I would be done by. I always confider every beaft that works for me as my fervant, and entitled to wages; but as they cannot use money, I pay them in things of more value to them; and make it a rule, unless in cases of great necessity, (when corn or hay, for instance, are likely to be spoiled) to let them enjoy rest on the Sabbath-day. I am very cautious of not letting any beast work beyond its strength, and always give them their food in due ieason; nor do I ever suffer them to be beatlor cruelly used. Besides giving them what what I call their daily wages, I indulge them with all the comforts I can afford them. In fummer, when the business of the day is over, my horses enjoy themselves in a good pasture; and in winter, they are -theltered from the inclemencies of the weather in a warm stable. If they get old, I contrive some easy task for them; and when they can work no longer, let them live without it, till age and infirmities make their lives burthensome to themselves, when I have them put to as eafy a death as possible. Though my cows and fheep do not work for me, I think them entitled to a recompense for the profit I receive from their milk and wool, and endeavour to repay them with the kindest usage: and even my jack-ass finds mercy from me; for I could not bear to see so useful a creature ill-treated; and as for my dogs, I fet great store by them on account of their fidelity.

These are very excellent rules indeed, Mr. Wilson, and I wish they were generally followed; for I believe many poor beasts suffer a great deal from the ill-treatment inslicted on them, the horses in post-chaises and hackney-coaches in London particularly. Yes, Madam, said the farmer, I have heard so, and could tell you such stories of cruelties exercised on brutes in the country, as would quite shock you; and have seen in my own family such an instance of the ill-effects of neglecting them, as has confirmed me in the notions I learnt from the good fermon I told you of.

I have a brother, whom I at present maintain; my father gave him an equal portion with myself, but neither he nor his wife were industrious, nor had they any feeling for dumb creatures. He trufted the care of his horses to his plough-boys, who used to ride them about, let them go without water, and frequently neglect both to feed and clean them; and indeed, he himself grudged their victuals: so they grew leaner and leaner, and at last were really killed with hard work and hard living. His cows were kept fo badly in the winter, that they foon loft their milk; and the calves they had, for want of proper management, died; as did the cows themselves in a short time afterwards. The Theep got a diffemper, which fcon put an end to them. His pigs being kept in the most dirty way in the world, and sometimes left without food for two days together, got hide-bound and full of vermin; and his poultry dropped off with the roup and other disorders, till he had none lest. The jack-his own fervice, or let out to draw a fandcart: this excessive labour, with scarcely time allowed him to seek a scanty living amongst thistles and hedges, soon put an end to him. These losses my brother had no means to repair, for without cattle he could not cultivate his farm, and was soon reduced to poverty; and were I not to maintain him, he must be a beggar; for thro' want of air and exercise he lost his health, and is now incapable of working. His wife died some years before of an illness, which was the consequence of indolence and inactivity.

I am much obliged to you for your flory, Mr. Wilson, said Mrs. Benson, and hope my children will never forget it; for it certainly is a duty to extend our clemency to beafts and other animals. Nay, we are Strictly commanded in the scriptures to shew commession to the beasts of others, even to these of our enemies; surely, then, those which are our own property, and work for us, have a peculiar claim to it. There is one custom which shocks me very much, and that is, pounding of cattle; I fancy, Mr. Wilson, you do not practise that much? Why, Madam, replied he, I should much rather pound the owners of them, through whose neglect or dishenesty it genetally herally happens that hories trespals on other people's land. If any beaft accidentally gets into my grounds, I fend it home to its owner, for it certainly is no wilful fault in the creature to feek the best pasture it can find; but if I have reason to suppose his owner turned him in, I then think myfelf obliged to do what the law directs in that respect: but, though it is a secret I am obliged to keep from my neighbours. I may fafely confess to you, Madam, that I have not the heart to let a poor beaft starve in a pound. As there are no Courts of Justice in which they can feek redress, I erect one for them in my own breaft, where humanity pleads their cause. I wish they had fuch an advocate in every breaft, Mr. Wilson, said the Lady: but my watch reminds me that we must now take our leave, which I do with many thanks to you and Mrs. Wilson, for your kind entertainment and good cheer, and shall be happy to return your civilities at my own house, and pray bring your whole family with you.

She then defired her fon and daughter to prepare for their departure. Frederick was grown fo intimate with little Neddy, that he could fearcely be prevailed on to leave him, till he recollected Robin and the Linnet.

As they returned in the coach, Mrs. Benfon remarked, that Farmer Wilson's flory was enough to make every one who heard it careful of their live stock for their own fakes: but, faid she, the pleasure and advantage will be greatly increased, if it is done from a principle of humanity as well as interest. Miss Benson answered, that The hoped the should neither treat animals ill, nor place her affections on them too strongly. That, my dear, replied her good mamma, is the proper medium to be ob-The speech you made for the ant, mamma, faid Harriet, has fearcely ever been out of my head fince: I should like to hear what you could fay for every live creature we fee. I had need have ftrong lungs, my dear, to perform such a task as that, replied Mrs. Benson. I shall, on all proper occasions, be ready to lend my tongue to the dumb, and to speak for those who cannot utter their own forrows and injuries.

In a short time they arrived at home. The maid, to whose care the birds had been entrusted, gave a good account of her charge; and Miss Harriet and Master Frederick went to bed in peace, after a day spent with so much pleasure and improve-

CHAP. XXII,

HE next morning the Redbreafts attended as usual, and Robin was still better, but his father began to fear he would never perfectly recover from his accident; however, he kept his apprehensions to himfelf, and fuffered the little ones to entertain their lame brother with a relation of what they had feen the day before in the orchard. Frederick and Harriet were for diverted with the chattering and chirping of the little things, that they did not miss the parent's fong. When the young ones had staid as long as she thought right, the hen Redbreast summoned them away, and all took leave of Robin, who longed to go with them, but was not able. The father reminded him, that he had great reason to rejoice in his present situation, considering all things; on which he refumed his cheerfulness, and giving a sprightly twitter, hopped into Master Frederick's hand, which was spread open to receive him. The rest then flew away, and Miss Harriet and her brother prepared for their morning talks. The

The Redbreasts alighted as usual to drink in the court-yard, and were preparing to return to the orchard, when Flapfy expressed a desire to see a little about the world; for the faid it would be very mopish to be always confined to the orchard; and Dicky feconded her request. Peckfy replied, that however her curiofity might be excited, the had known fo much happiness in the nest, that she was strongly attached to the paternal spot, and could gladly pass her life there. The parents both commended her contented disposition; but her father faid, that as there was nothing blameable in the inclination Dicky and Flapfy discovered for seeing the world, provided it was kept within due bounds, he would readily gratify it: then asking if they were fufficiently refreshed, took wing, and led the way to a neighbouring grove, where he placed his little tribe amongst the branches of a venerable oak.

Here their ears were charmed with a most enchanting concert of music. On one tree a Blackbird and a Thrush poured forth their strong melodious notes; on another a number of Linnets joined their sweet voices: exalted in the air a Sky-Lark modulated his delightful pipe; whilst a brother of the wood, seated on a cool-refreshing turf, made the grove re-echo with his melody; to these the Nightingale joined his enchanting lay. In short, not a note was wanting to complete the harmony.

The little Redbreafts were fo exceeding ly charmed, that for a while they continued listening with silent rapture; at length, Dicky exclaimed, How happy should I be to join the cheerful band, and live for ever in this charming place! It is, replied his mother, a very pleasant situation, to be fure; but could you be fenfible of the fuperior advantages, which, as a Redbreaft, you may enjoy by taking up your abode in the orchard, you would never wish to change it: for my own part, I find myself fo happy in that calm retreat. that nothing but necessity shall ever drive me from it. Peckfy declared, that though she was much delighted with the novelty of the scene, and charmed with the music, she now felt ardent defire to return home; but Flapfy wished to see a little more first. Well, said the father, your defire shall be gratified; let us take a circuit in this grove, for I wish your to see every thing worth observation in every place you go to; and not to fly about the world, as many giddy birds do, without the least improvement from their travels. On this 14 he

he spread his wings as the signal of departure, which his family obeyed.

Observing a parcel of boys creeping silently along, stop, said he, let us perch on this tree, and see what these little Monsters are about. Scarcely were they seated, when one of the boys mounted an adjacent tree, and took a nest of half-sledged Linnets, which he brought in triumph to his companions.

At this instant, a family of Thrushes unfortunately chirped, which directed another boy to the place of their habitation; on which he climbed, and eagerly seized the little unfortunate creatures. Having met with so much success, they lest the grove to exult, at their own homes, over their wretched captives, for ever separated from their tender parents; who soon came back, laden with the gain of their labour, which they had kindly destined for the suftenance of their insant broods.

The little Redbreasts were now speciators of those parental agenies which had been somerly described to them; and Pecksy cried out, Who would desire to live in this grove, who had once experienced the comforts of the orchard? Dicky and Flapsy were desirous to depart, being alarmed for their own safety. No, said the father, let us flay a little longer-now we will go on. They accordingly took another flight, and faw a man scattering feed upon the ground. See there, faid Dicky, what fine food that man throws down; I dare fay he is some good creature who is a friend to the feathered race; shall we alight and partake of his bounty? Do not form too hasty an opinion, Dicky, faid the father; watch here with me a little while, and then do as you think proper. All the little ones stretched out their necks, and kept a curious eye fixed on the man. In a few minutes, a number of Sparrows, Chaffinches, and Linnets descended, and began to regale themselves; but in the midst of their feast, a net was suddenly cast over them, and they were all taken captive, The man, who was a bird-eatcher by profession, called to his assistant, who brought a cage, divided into a number of small partitions, in which the Linnets and Chaffinches were separately deposited. In this difinal prison, where they had scarcely room to flutter, were those little creatures confined, who lately poured forth their fongs of joy, fearless of danger. As for the Sparrows, their necks were wring, and they were put in a bag together. The Tittle Redbreafts trembled for themselves, and and were in great haste to take wing. Stay, said the father, Dicky has not yet made acquaintance with this friend of the seathered race. No, said Dicky, nor do I desire it; defend me, and all who are dear to me, from such friends as these! Well, said the sather, learn from this instance, never to form an hasty judgment, nor to put yourself into the power of strangers, who offer you savours you have no right to expect from their hands.

Indeed, my love, faid the mother bird, F am very anxious to get home; I have not lately been used to be long absent from it, and every excursion I make endears it to me. O, the day is not half spent, replied her mate; and I hope, for the gratification of the little ones, you will confent to compleat the ramble. Come, let us visit another part of the grove; I am acquainted with its inmost recesses. His mate acquiesced, and they proceeded on their journey. At length, the father hastily called out, Turn this way! turn this way! The whole party obeyed the word of command, and found the good effects of their obedience; for in an instant they saw a flash of fire, a thick smoke followed it, and immediately they heard a dreadful found, and faw a young Redstart fall bleeding to the ground, on on which he struggled just long enough to cry, Oh! my dear father! why did I not listen to your kind admonitions, which I now find, too late, were the dictates of tenderness! and then expired.

The little Redbreafts were ftruck with consternation at this dreadful accident; and Peckfy, who recovered the foonest, begged her father would inform her by what means the Redstart was killed. He was shot to death, faid he; and had you not followed my directions, it might have been the fate of every one of you: therefore, let it be a lesson to you, to follow every injunction of your parents with the fame readiness for the future. You may depend on it, our experience teaches us to foresee many dangers, which such young creatures as you have no notion of; and when we defire you to do, or to forbear any thing, it is for the fake of your fafety or advantage: therefore, Dicky, never more stand enquiring; as you fometimes have done, and asking Why we tell you to do for and fo? for had that been the cafe now, you, who were in a direct line with the gunner, would have been inevitably fhot. They all faid they would observe implicit ol edience. Do so, said he; but in order to this, you must also remember to

practife, in our absence, what we enjoin you when present. For instance, some kinds of food are very prejudicial to your health, which we would not, on any account, let you taste when we are by; these you must not indulge in when away from us, whatever any other bird may fay in recommendation of them. Neither must you engage in any dangerous enterprize, which others, who have natural strength or acquired agility, go through with fafety; nor should you go to any places which we have pointed out as dangerous, nor join any company which we have forbid you to make acquaintance with. This poor Redstart might have avoided his fate; for I heard his father, when I was last in the grove, advise him not to fly about by himfelf, till he had shewn him the dangers of the world. Peckfy answered, that the knew the value of parental instruction fo well, that she should certainly treasure up in her heart every maxim of it; and the others promifed to do the fame: but, faid Flapfy, I cannot understand the nature of the accident which occasioned the death of the Redstart. Neither can I explain it to you, my dear, replied the father; I only know, that it is a very common practice with some men to carry instruments, from which they discharge what proves fatal fatal to many a bird; but I have, by aftertive observation, learnt how to evade the mischief. Whenever I go from the orchard I always get upon a high tree, and look all around me; if I fee any gunners I take a different course, (the thickness of the underwood prevented my discovering. him who shot the Redstart.) I also carefully avoid affociating with those birds, which do mischief to the property of mankind; for those that join with thieves and ravagers deserve, and must justly expect to fhare their fate: let me therefore advise you to be particularly careful to keep preper company, and gain an honest character, as it will enfure you the good opinion of others. But come, let us descend, as we may do it with fafety, and refresh ourselves a little, and then we will see if we cannot find a place where you may have amusement, without being exposed to such dangers as attend the inhabitants of woods and groves. Are you fufficiently rested to take a pretty long flight? O yes, cried Dicky, who was quite eager to leave the spot, in which, a short time before, he had longed to pass his life: the rest joined in the same wish, and every wing was instantly expanded.

CHAP. XXIII.

HE father led the way, and in a very short space of time he and his family arrived at the estate of a Gentleman, who having a plentiful fortune, endeavoured to collect all that was curious in art and nature, for the amusement of his own mind, and the gratification of others. He had a house like a palace, furnished with every expensive rarity; his gardens, to which the Redbreafts took their flight, were laid out in such a manner as to afford the most delightful variety to the eye. Amongst other articles of tafte were an aviary and a menagery. The former was built like a temple, enclosed with brass wire; the framework was painted green, and ornamented with carving gilt; in the middle a fountain continually threw up fresh water, which fell into a bason whose brink was enamelled with flowers; at one end were partitions for birds nefts, and troughs containing various kinds of feed, and materials for building nests: this part was carefully sheltered from every inclemency of weather, and numbers of perches were placed in different parts of the aviary, and it was furround-ed by a most beautiful shrubbery.

A habitation like this, in which all the conveniencies of life feemed to be collected, where abundance was supplied without toil, where each gay fongster might sing himself to repose in the midse of ease and plenty, fafe from the dangers of the woods; appeared to our young travellers defirable beyond all the situations in the world, and Dicky expressed an earnest desire to be admitted into it. Well, faid the father, let us not determine hastily, it will be adviseable first to enquire whether its inhabitants are really happy, before you make interest to become one of the number; place yourfelves by me on this shrub, and whilst we rest ourselves; we shall have an opportunity of observing what passes.

The first bird that attracted their notice was a Dove, who sat cooing by himself in a corner in accents so gentle and sweet, that a stranger to his language would have listened to them with delight; but the Redbreasts, who understood their import, heard them with sympathetic concern.

"Oh, my dear, my beloved mate," faid he, "am I then divided from you for ever? What avails it, that I am furnished here with all the elegancies and luxuries of life? Deprived Deprived of your company, I have no enjoyment of them; the humblest morfel, though gained with toil and danger, would be infinitely preferable to me if shared with you. Here am I that up for the remainder of my days, in society for which I have no relish, whilst she, who has hitherto been the beloved partner of all my joys, is for ever feparated from me! In vain will you, with painful wing, purfue your anxious fearch in quest of me; never, never more, shall I bring you the welcome refreshment; never shall I hear your foothing voice, and delight in the foft murmurs of the infant pair, which you hatched with fuch care, and nursed with such tenderness! No, my beloved nestlings, never will your wretched father be at liberty to guide your flight, and instruct you in the duties of your station!", Here his voice faultered, and overcome with bitter reflections, he refigned himfelf a prey to filent forrow.

This Dove is not happy, however faid the hen Redbreast to her mate, and no wonder: but let us attend to the notes of that Lark. His eyes were turned up towards the sky, he fluttered his wings, he strained his throat, and would, to a human eve, have appeared in raptures of joy; but the Redbreasts perceived that he was inflamed with rage. " And am I to be constantly confined in this horrid place?" sang he. "Is my upward flight to be impeded by bars and wires? Must I no longer foar towards that bright luminary, and make the arch of heaven resound with my singing? Shall I cease to be the herald of the morn, or must I be so in this contracted fphere? No, ye partners of my captivity, henceforth fleep on and take ignoble rest; and may you lose in flumber the remembrance of past pleasures! O cruel and unjust man! is it not enough that I proclaims the approach of day, that I foothe your fultry hours, that I heighten the delights of evening, but must I, to gratify your unseeling wantonness, be secluded from every joy my heart holds dear, and condemned to a fituation I detest? Take your delicious dainties, referve your flowing stream for those who can relish them, but give me liberty. But why do I address myself to you who are heedless of my misery?" Here casting an indignant look around, he stopt his iong.

What think you now, Dicky, faid the Redbreaft, have you as high an idea of the happiness of this place, as you conceived at the first view of it? I cannot help thinking still, replied Dicky, that it is a charming retreat, and must be very comfortable to have every thing provided for one's use. Well, said the father, let us move, and observe those Linnets who are building their nest. Accordingly they siew to a tree, whose branches formed a part of the shelter of the aviary, where they easily heard, without being themselves observed, all that passed in it.

" Come, " faid one of the Linnets. " let us go on with our work, and finish the nest, though it will be rather a melancholy task to hatch a fet of little prisoners. How difterent was the case when we could anticipate the pleasure of rearing a family to all the joys of liberty? Men, it is true, now, with officious care, supply us with the necessary materials, and we may make a very good nest; but I protest I had much rather be at the trouble of feeking them. What pleafure have we experienced in plucking a bit of wool from a sheep's back, in searching for moss, in selecting the best feather where numbers were left to our choice, in stopping to rest on the top of a tree, which commanded an extensive prospect, in joining a choir of fongiters whom we accidentally met---Bul now our days pass with repeated fameness; variety, so necessary to give a relish to all enjoyment, is wanting. Instead.

stead of the fongs of joy we formerly heard from every spray, our ears are constantly annoyed with the found of mournful lamentations, transports of rage, or murmurs of discontent. Could we reconcile ourselves to the loss of liberty, it is impossible to be happy here, unless we could harden our hearts to every sympathetic feeling."

"True," faid his mate; "yet I am refolved to try what patience, relignation, and employment will effect; and hope, as our young ones will never know what liberty is, they will not pine as we do for it." Saying this she picked up a straw, her mate followed the example, and they pursued

At this instant a hen Goldsinch brought forth her brood, who were sull sledged. Come, said she, my nesslings, use your wings; I have taught you to sly in all directions. So saying, the sittle ones divided: one slew upwards; but emulous to outdo a little Sparrow, which was slying in the air above the aviary, he hit himself against the wires of the dome, and would have sallen to the bottom, but that he was stopped by one of the perches.

As foon as he recovered, "Why cannot I foar as I fee other birds do?" faid he. "Alas!" cried the mother, "we are in a place of confinement; we are that up and can never get out; but here is food in abundance, and every other necessary." "Never get out?" exclaimed the whole brood, "then adieu to happiness!" She attempted to footh them, but in vain.

The little Redbreatts rejoiced in their liberty, and Dicky gave up the defire of living in the aviary, and wished to be gone. Stop, said his father, let us first hear what those Canaries are saying.

The Canaries had almost compleated their nest. "How fortunate is our lot," faid the hen bird, " in being placed in this aviary! How preferable is it to the small cage we built in last year?" "Yes," replied her mate; " yet liow comfortable was that in comparison with the still smaller ones in which we were once separately confined. For my part, I have no wish to fly abroad, for I should neither know what to do, nor where to go; and it shall be my endeavour to inspire my young ones with the fame fentiments I feel. Indeed, we owe the highest gratitude to those who make fuch kind provision for a set of soreigners, who have no refources but their bounty; and my best lays shall be devoted to them. Nothing is wanting to compleat the happiness of this place, but to:

Poor creatures! it must be very mortifying to them to be shut up here, and see others of their kind enjoying sull freedom. No wonder they are perpetually quarrelling; for my part, I sincerely pity them, and am ready to submit to the occasional insults and affronts I meet with, out of compassion." of roll mount of

You now conceive, Dicky, faid the cock Redbreaft, that this place is not, as you supposed, the region of persect happiness; you may also observe, that it is not the abode of univerfal wretchedness. It is by no means defirable to be shut up for life, let the place of confinement be ever fo splendid; but should it at any time be your lot to be caught and imprisoned, which may possibly be the case, adopt the sentiments of the Linnet and the Canary Bird: employment will pass away many an hour, that would have been a heavy load if frent in grief and anxiety; and reflections on the bleffings and comforts that are still in your power, will lessen your regret for those which are loft. But come, pick up some of the feeds which are scattered on the outfide of the aviary, for that is no robbery, and then I will show you another scene.

As foon as they had regaled themselves with the superfluities of the seathered captives, they took their slight to a different part of the garden, in which was a mena-

The menagery confifted of a number of pens, built round a grass-plat; in each was a pan of water, a fort of box, containing a bed or nest, a trough for sood, and a perch. In every pen were confined a pair of birds, and every pair was either of a different species, or distinguished for some beautiful variety either of form or plumage. The wooden bars which were put in the front, were painted partly green and partly white, which dazzled the sight at the first glance, and so attracted the eyes, that there was no seeing what was behind without going close up to the pens.

The little Redbreafts knew not what fight to expect, and begged their parent to gratify their curiofity. Well, follow me, faid the father; but I believe you must alight upon the cross-bars, or you will not be able to examine the beauties of these fowls. They did so, and in the first pen was a pair of Partridges. The size of these birds so greatly exceeding their own, assonished them all; but notwithstanding this, the amiable Pecksy was quite interested with their modest gentle appearance, and faid. The thought no one could ever wish to injure them. True, Peckfy, replied the father, they have, from the harmlessness of their disposition, a natural claim to tenderness and compassion; and yet I believe there are few birds who meet with less: for I have observed, that numbers share the same fate as the Redsfart, which you faw die in the grove. I have myfelf feen many put to death that way. For a long time I was excessively puzzled to account for this fatality, and refolved, if possible, to gratify my curiofity. At length, I faw a man kill two and take them away. very man had shewn me great kindness, in feeding me when I first left my father's nest; so I had no apprehension of his doing me an injury, and refolved to follow him. When he arrived at his own house I saw him deliver the victims of his cruelty to another person, who hung them up tegether by the legs, in a place which had a variety of other dead things in it, the fight of which shocked me exceedingly, and I could flay no longer. I therefore flew back to the field in which I had feen the murder committed; and in fearthing about, found the neft belonging to the poor creatures, in which were feveral young ones flarved to death. How dreadful is the fate of young animals, who lofe their parents before they are able to shift for themselves! and how dutiful ought those to be, to whom the blessing of parental instruction and assistance is continued!

When the next morning arrived I went again to see after the dead Partridges, and found them hanging as before; and this was the case the day after: but the following morning, I faw a boy stripping all their feathers off. As foon as he had compleated this horrid operation, a woman took them, whom I ventured to follow, as the window of the place she entered stood open; where, to my aftonishment, I beheld her twist their wings about, and fasten them to their fides, then cross their legs upon their breafts, and run something quite through their bodies. After this she put them before a place, which glowed with a brightness something resembling the setting sun, which, on the woman's retiring, I approached, and found intolerably hot; I therefore made a hasty retreat; but resolving to know the end of the Partridges, kept hovering about the house; and at last looking into a window, I faw them, fmoking hot, fet before the man who murdered them, them, who was accompanied by feveral cthers; all of whom eyed them with as much delight, as I have feen any of you discover at the fight of the finest worm or insect that could be procured. In an instant after this, the poor Partridges were divided, limb from limb, and each one of the party present had his share, till every bone was picked. There were fome other things devoured in the same manner; from which I learnt, that men feed on birds and other animals, as we do on those little creatures which are destined for our sustenance, only they do not eat them alive. Pray, father, faid Dicky, do they eat Redbreafts? I believe not, replied he; but I have reason to fuppose they make many a meal on Sparrows, for I have beheld vast numbers of them killed.

At this instant their attention was at? tracted by one of the Partridges in the pen, who thus addressed his mate:

"Well, my love, as there is no chance for our being fet at liberty, I think we may as well prepare our nest, that you may deposit your eggs in it. The employment of hatching and raising your little ones will, at least, mitigate the wearisomeness of confinement, and I promise myself many happy days yet; for as we are fo well fed and attended, attended, I think we may form hopes that our offspring will also be provided for; and though they will not be at liberty to range about as we formerly did, they will avoid many of those terrors and anxieties to which our race are frequently exposed at one feafon of the year in particular." "I am very ready to follow your advice," faid the hen Partridge, " and the bufiness will foon be compleated, for the nest is in a manner made for us, it only wants a little adjusting: I will therefore set about it immediately, and will no longer waste the hours in fruitless lamentations, since I am convinced, that content will render every fituation eafy, in which we can enjoy the company of our dearest friends, and obtain the necessaries of life." So saying, she retired into the place provided for the purpose on which she was now intent, and her mate followed, in order to lend her all the affiftance in his power.

I am very glad, faid the hen Redbreast, that my young ones have had the opportunity of seeing such an example as this. You now understand what benefit it is of to have a temper of resignation; more than half the evils of life, I am well convinced, arise from fretfulness and disconventent; and would every one, like these Partridges, fridges, try to make the best of their condition, we should hear but few complaints; for there are much fewer real than imaginary misfortunes. But come, let us take a peep into the next pen. Here they beheld a pair of fine Pheafants, who were quietly picking up some grain that was scattered for them; from which might be inferred, that they had, like the Partridges, reconciled themselves to their lot. little Redbreasts were much pleased with the beauty of the cock bird; but as there was no conversation to be heard here, their parents defired them to fly on; as pleafures, by which the eye only was amuled, were not deferving of long attention.

They accordingly hopped to the next partition, in which were confined a pair of penciled Pheafants. Flapfy was quite delighted with the elegance of their form, and the beauty of their plumage, and could have staid the whole day looking at them; but as these birds were also tame and contented, nothing surther could be learnt here, than a confirmation of what the Partridges had taught. Our travellers therefore proceeded still farther, and sound a pair of gold Pheasants. Their splendid appearance struck the young Redbreasts with assonishment, and raised such sentiments of respect, that they were even fearful of approaching birds, which they efteemed as fo much superior to themselves: but their father defiring they would never form a judgment of birds from a glittering outfide, placed his family where they had an opportunity of observing, that this splendid pair had but little intrinsic merit. They were proud of their fine plumage, and their chief employment was walking backwards and forwards to display it; and sometimes they endeavoured to push through the bars of their prison, that they might get abroad to shew their rich plumage to the world, and exult over those who were, in this respect, inferior to them. How hard, said one of them, it is to be shut up here, where there are no other birds to admire us, and where we have no little ugly creatures to ridicule.

If fuch are your defires, faid the hen Redbreast, I am sure you are happier here than at liberty; for you would, by your proud affected airs, excite the contempt of every bird who has right sentiments, and consequently meet with continual mertisication, to which even the ugliest might contribute.

Peckfy defired to know if all fine birds overe proud and affected? By no means, replied replied her mother; you observed the other two pair of Pheasants, who were, in my opinion, nearly equal to these for beauty and elegance. How easy and unassuming are they, and how much are their charms improved by the graces of humility! I often wonder that any bird should indulge itfelf in pride. What have fuch little creatures as we to boaft of? The largest species amongst us is very inferior to many animals we see in the world; and man is lord over the greatest and strongest even of these. Nay, man himself has no cause to be proud; for he is subject to death as well as the nicanest creature in the world, as I have had opportunities of observing. But come, the day wears away, let us view the other parts of this inclosure.

On this the father conducted his family for a variety of pens, in which were different forts of foreign birds, of whom he could give but little account; therefore would not fuffer his young ones to stand gazing at them long, lest they should imbibe injurious notions of them: especially when he heard Dicky cry out, as he lest the last pen,—I dare say that Stork is a very cruel yoracious creature; I make no doubt but he would eat us all one after the other if he could get at us. Take care, Dicky, faid the father, how you form an ill opinion of any one on flight grounds. You cannot possibly tell what the character of this Stork is, merely from his appearance; you are a stranger to his language, andcannot fee the disposition of his heart. If you give way to a suspicious temper, your own little breast will be in a state of constant perturbation; you will absolutely exclude yourfelf from the bleffings of fociety, and will be shunned and despised by every bird of every kind. This Stork, whom you thus censure, is far from deserving your ill opinion. He would do you no harm, and is remarkable for his filial affection. I saw him taken prisoner. He was carrying his aged father on his back, whom he had for a long time fed and comforted: the weight of this precious burden impeded his flight; and being at length wearied with it, he descended to the ground to rest himself, when a cruel man, who was out on the business of bird-catching, threw a net over them, and then seized him by the neck. His poor father, who was before worn out with age and infirmities, unable to bear this calamity, therefore fell from his back and instantly expired. This Stork, after cafting a look of anguish on his dear parent, which I shall never forget, turned turned with fury on his perfecutor, whom he beat with his wings with all the strength he had; but it was in vain to contend with a being fo much more powerful than himfelf; and, in spite of all his exertions, he was conveyed to this place. But come, let us pick up a little refreshment, and then return to the orchard. Saying this, he alighted on the ground, as did his mate and her family, where they met with a plentiful repast in the provisions which had been accidentally scattered by the person, whose employment it was to bring food for the inhabitants of the menagery. When they had fufficiently regaled themselves, all parties gladly returned to the nest, and every heart rejoiced in the possession of liberty and peace.

CHAP. XXIV.

FOR three fuccessive days nothing remarkable happened, either at Mr. Benton's or the Redbreasts nest. The little family came daily to the breakfast-table, and Robin daily recovered from his accident, though not sufficiently to fly well; K 4 but but Dicky, Flapfy, and Peckfy continued so healthy, and improved so fast, that they required no further care; and the third morning after their tour to the grove, &c. they did not commit the least error. When they retired from the parlour into the courtyard, to which Robin accompanied them, the father expressed great delight, that they were at length able to shift for themselves. And now a wonderful change took place in his own heart. That ardent affection for his young, which had hitherto made him, for their fakes, patient of toil, and fearless of danger, was on a sudden quenched; but, from the goodness of his disposition, he still felt a kind solicitude for their suture welfare; therefore called them around him, and thus addressed them:

"You must be sensible, my dear young ones, that from the time you lest the egg-shell, till the present instant, both your mother and I have nourished you with the zenderest love. We have taught you all the arts of life which are necessary to procure you subsistence, and preserve you from danger. We have shewn you a variety of characters in the different classes of birds; and pointed out those which are to be imitated, and those which are to be shunned. You must now shift for your-felves; but before we part, let me repeat my admonition, to use industry, avoid contention, cultivate peace, and be contented with your condition. Let none of your own species excel you in any amiable quality, for want of your endeavours to equal the best; and do your duty in every relation of life, as we have done ours by you. Prefer a calm retirement to the gay scenes of levity and dissipation, for there the greatest degree of happiness is to be found. You, Robin, I would advise, on account of your infirmity, to attach yourself to Mr. Benson's family, where you have been so kindly cherished."

Whilst he thus spake, his mate stood by, who finding the same change beginning to take place in her own breast, she viewed her family with tender regret; and when he ceased, cried out, "Adieu, ye dear objects of my late cares and folicitude! may ye never more stand in need of a mother's affiftance! Though nature now dismisses me from the arduous task, which I have long daily performed, I rejoice not, but would gladly continue my toil, for the fake of its attendant pleasures. Oh! delightful fentiments of maternal love, how can I part with you? Let me, my neftlings, give you a last embrace." Then spreading her wings.

wings, she folded them successively to her botom, and instantly recovered her tranquillity. Each young one expressed its grateful thanks to both father and mother, and with these acknowledgments silial affection expired in their breasts; instead of which, a respectful friendship succeeded. Thus was that tender tie dissolved, which had hitherto bound this little family together; for the parents had performed their duty, and the young ones had no need of farther assistance.

The old Redbreasts having now only themselves to provide for, resolved to be no longer burthensome to their benefactors; and after pouring forth their gratitude in the most lively strains, they took their slight together, resolving never to separate. Every care now vanished, and their little hearts selt no sentiments but those of cheerfulness and joy. They ranged the sields and gardens, sipped at the coolest springs, and indulged themselves in the pleasures of society, joining their cheerful notes with those of other gay choristers, who animate and heighten the delightful scenes of rural life.

The first morning that the old Redbreasts were missing from Mrs. Benson's breakfast-table, Frederick and his sister were greatly alarmed.

alarmed for their fafety; but their mamma. faid, she was of opinion that they had left their neftlings; as it was the nature of animals in general to difmifs their young, as foon as they were able to provide for themfelves. That is very strange, replied Miss Harriet; I wonder what would become of my brother and me, were you and papa to ferve us fo? And is a boy of fix, or a girl of eleven years old, capable of shifting for themselves? said her mamma. No, my dear child, you have need of a much longer continuance of our care than birds and other animals; and therefore God has ordained that parental affection, when once awakened, should always remain in the human breaft, unless extinguished by the undutiful behaviour of the child.

And shall we see the old Redbreasts no more? cried Frederick. I do not know that you will, replied Mrs. Benson, though it is not unlikely that they may visit us again in the winter; but let not their absence grieve you, my love, for I dare say they are very fafe and happy.

At that inftant the young ones arrived, and met with a very joyful reception. The amusement they afforded to Master Benson, reconciled him to the loss of their parents; but Harriet declared, she could not help being forry that they were gone. I shall, for the future, mamma, said she, take a great deal of notice of animals; for I have had much entertainment in observing the ways of these Robins. I highly approve your resolution, my dear, said Mrs. Benfon, and hope the occasional instruction I have at different times given you, has surnished you with general ideas respecting the proper treatment of animals. I will now inform you, upon what principles the rules of conduct I prescribe to myself on this subject are founded.

I consider, that the same almighty and good God, who created mankind, made all other living creatures likewise; and appointed them their different ranks in the creation, that they might form together a community, receiving and conferring reciprocal benefits.

There is no doubt that the Almighty defigned all beings for happiness, proportionable to the faculties he endued them with; therefore, whoever wantonly destroys that happiness, acts contrary to the will of his Maker.

The world we live in feems to have been principally defigned for the use and comfort of mankind, who, by the Divine appointment, have dominion over the inferior ferior creatures; in the exercise of which, it is certainly their duty to imitate the fupreme Lord of the Universe, by being merciful to the utmost of their power. They are endued with reason, which enables them to discover the different natures of brutes, the faculties they posses, and how they may be made serviceable in the world; and as beasts cannot apply these faculties to their own use in so extensive a way, and numbers of them (being unable to provide for their own sustained) are indebted to men for many of the necessaries of life, men have an undoubted right to their labour in return.

Several other kinds of animals, which are sustained at the expence of mankind, cannot labour for them; from such they have a natural claim to whatever they can supply towards the food and raiment of their benefactors; and therefore, when we take the wool and milk of the flocks and herds, we take no more than our due, and what they can very well spare; as they seem to have an over-abundance given them, that they may be able to return their obligations to us.

Some creatures have nothing to give us but their own bodies: these have been expressly destined, by the supreme Governor.

as food for mankind, and he has appointed an extraordinary increase of them for this very purpose; such an increase, as would be very injurious to us if all were suffered to live. These we have an undoubted right to kill; but we should make their short lives as comfortable as possible.

Other creatures feem to be of no particular use to mankind, but as they serve to furnish our minds with contemplations on the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, and to exhibitate our spirits by their cheerfulness; these should not be wantonly killed, nor treated with the least degree of cruelty, but should be at full liberty to enjoy the blessings assigned them; unless they abound to such a degree, as to become injurious, by devouring the food which is designed for man, or for animals more immediately beneficial to him, whom it is his duty to protect.

Some animals, fuch as wild beafts; ferpents, &c. are in their natures ferocious, noxious, or venemous, and capable of injuring the health, or even of destroying the lives of men, and other creatures of a higher rank than themselves: these, if they leave the secret abodes which are allotted them, and become offensive, certainly may with justice be killed.

In a word, my dear, we should endeavour to regulate our regards according to the utility and necessities of every living creature with which we are any ways connected; and confequently should prefer the happiness of mankind to that of any animal whatever. Next to these (who being partakers of the fame nature with ourfelves, are more properly our fellow-creatures) we should consider our cattle and domestick animals, and take care to supply every creature that is dependent on us with proper food, and keep it in its proper place: after their wants are supplied, we should extend our benevolence and compassion as: far as possible to the inferior ranks of beings; and if nothing farther is in our power, should at least refrain from exercising; cruelties on them. For my own part, I never willingly put to death, or cause to be put to death, any creature but when there is a real necessity for it; and have my food. dressed in a plain manner, that no more lives may be facrificed for me, than nature requires for my subsistence in that way which God has allotted me. But I fear I have tired you with my long lecture, fo will now difinifs you.

Whilst Mrs. Benson was giving these influctions to her daughter, Frederick diverted himself with the young Robins who having no kind parents now to admonish them, made a longer visit than usual; so that Mrs. Benson would have been obliged to drive them away, had not Pecksy, on seeing her move from her feat, recollected that she and her brother and sister had been guilty of an impropriety; she therefore reminded them that they should no longer intrude, and led the way out at the window; the others followed her, and Mrs. Benson gave permission to her children to take their morning's walk before they began their lessons.

CHAP. XXV.

As the old Robins, who were the Heroe and Heroine of my tale, are made happy, it is time for me to put an end to it: but my young readers will doubtless wish to know the sequel of the history, I shall therefore inform them of it in as few words as possible.

Miss Harriet followed her mamma's precepts and example, and grew up an universal benefactres to all people, and all creatures.

creatures, with whom fire was any ways connected.

Frederick was educated upon the same plan, and was never konwn to be cruel to animals, or to treat them with an improper degree of fondness: he was also remarkable for his benevolence, so as to deserve and obtain the character of a good MAN.

Miss Lucy Tenkins was quite reformed by Mrs. Benson's lecture, and her friend's example; but her brother continued his practice of exercifing barbarities on a variety of unfortunate animals, till he went to school; where having no opportunity of doing so, he gratified his malignant dispofition on his school-fellows, and made it his diversion to pull the hair, pinch, and teaze the younger boys; and by the time he became a man had for hardened his heart, that! no kind of distress affected him, nor did he care for any person but himself; consequently, he was despited by all with whom he had any intercourfe. In this manner he lived for fome years; at length, as he was inhumanly beating and spurring a fine horfe, merely because it did not go a faster pace than it was able to do, the poor creature, in its efforts to evade his blows, threw his

his barbarous rider, who was killed on the spot.

Farmer Wilson's prosperity increased with every succeeding year, and he acquired a plentiful fortune, with which he gave portions to each of his children, as opportunities offered, for settling them in the world; and he and his wife lived to a good old age, beloved and respected by all who knew them.

Mrs. Addis lost her parrot, by the diforder with which it was attacked whilst Mrs.
Benson was visiting at the house; and before she had recovered the shock of this misfortune, as she called it, her grief was renewed by the death of the old lap-dog.
About a year afterwards her monkey escaped to the top of the house, from whence he fell and broke his neck. The favourite cat went mad, and was obliged to be killed.
In short, by a series of calamities, all her
dear darlings were successively destroyed.
She supplied their places with new savourites, who gave her a great deal of satigue and trouble.

In the meanwhile her children grew up, and having experienced no tenderness from her, they scarcely knew they had a mamma; nor did those who had the care of their education inculcate, that her want of affection

[223]

tion did not cancel their duty, they therefore treated her with the utmost neglect, and she had no friend lest. In her old age, when she was no longer capable of amusing herfelf with cats, dogs, parrots, and monkies, she became sensible of her errors, and wished for the comforts which other parents enjoyed; but it was now too late, and she ended her days with forrow and regret.

This unfortunate Lady had tenderness enough in her disposition for all the purposes of humanity; and had she placed it on proper objects, agreeably to Mrs. Benson's rule, might have been, like her, a good wife, mother, friend, and mistress, confequently, respectable and happy. when a child, Mrs. Addis was (under an idea of making her tender-hearted) permitted to lavish immoderate fondness on animals, the care of which engroffed her whole attention, and greatly interrupted her education; fo that, instead of studying natural history, and other useful things, her time was taken up with pampering and attending upon animals, which she considered as the most important business in life.

Her children fell into faults of a different nature. Miss Addis being, as I observed in a former part of this history, left to the care of servants, grew up with very contracted notions. Amongst other prejudices, the imbibed that of being afraid of spiders, frogs, and other harmless things; and having been bit by the monkey when it escaped, as I before related, and terrified by the cat, when it went mad, she extended her fears to every kind of creature, and could not take a walk in the fields, or even in the street, without a thousand apprehensions. At last, her constitution, which from bad nurfing, was very delicate, was still more weakened by her continual apprehensions; and a rat happening to run across the path, as she was walking, she fell into fits, which afflicted her, at intervals, during the remainder of her life.

Master Addis, as soon as he became sensible of his mother's soible, conceived an inveterate hatred to animals in general, whom he regarded as his enemies; and thought he was avenging his own cause when he treated any with barbarity. Cats and dogs, in particular, he singled out as the objects of his revenge, because he considered them as his mother's greatest savourites; and many a one fell an innocent victim to his mistaken ideas.

The parent Redbreasts visited their kind benefactors the next winter; but as they were flying along one day, they faw fome crumbs of bread, which had been feattered by Miss Lucy Jenkins, who (as I observed before) had adopted the fentiments of her friend, in respect to compassion for animals, and refolved to imitate her in every excellence. The Redbreafts gratefully picked up the crumbs, and, encouraged by the gentle invitation of her looks, refolved to repeat their vifits; which they accordingly did, and found fuch an ample fupply, that they thought it more adviseable to go to her with their next brood, than to be burthensome to their old benefactors, who had a great number of pensioners to support: but Master and Miss Benson had frequently the pleasure of seeing them, and knew them from all their species by several particularities, which fo long an acquaintance had given them the opportunity of observing.

Robin, in pursuance of his father's advice, and agreeably to his own inclinations, attached himself to Mr. Benson's family, where he was an exceeding great favourite. He had before, under the conduct of his parents, made frequent excursions into the garden, and was, by their direction, enabled to get up into trees, but his wing never recovered sufficiently to enable him to take long flights: however, he found himself at liberty to do as he pleased, and therefore, during the fummer months, com; monly passed most of his time abroad, and reofted in trees, but visited the tea-table every morning; and there he usually met his fifter Peckfy, who took up her abode in the orchard, where she enjoyed the friendship of her father and mother. Dicky and Flapfy, who thought their company too grave, flew giddily about together. a short time they were both caught in a trap-cage, and put into the aviary, which Dicky once longed to inhabit. Here they were at first very miserable; but after a while, recollecting their good parent's advice, and the example of the Linnets and Pheasants, they at length reconciled themfelves to their lot, and each met with a mate, with whom they lived tolerably happy.

From the foregoing examples, I hope my young readers will felect the best for their own imitation, and take warning by the rest, otherwise my histories are written

Happy would it be for the animal creation, if every human being, like good-Mrs. Benson, consulted the welfare of inferior creatures, and neither spoiled them by by indulgence, or injured them by tyranny! Happy would mankind be, if every one, like her, acted in conformity to the will of their Maker; by cultivating in their own minds, and those of their children, the divine principle of UNIVERSAL BENEZ VOLENCE!
