

CHRISTIAN

ENDURANCE.

4170 Charles van Clifford.
Stierum 28^o 10

53-7

SB
STRICKLAND, J.M.
CHRISTIAN...
[1851]

37131048635270

1,308-9

CHRISTIAN ENDURANCE AND THE CHANGES OF LIFE.

BY MISS J. STRICKLAND, AND THE REV.^d J. YOUNG.
WITH EIGHT COLORED PLATES.

LONDON:
THOMAS DEAN & SON,
THREADNEEDLE STREET.

THE Bourk fourte lady y de Bo within her fa
French
A se still mo shipwre son, and ard, and drownec being t which th were sei

PREFACE.

THE misfortunes and trials of Mademoiselle de Bourke are not imaginary. At the early age of fourteen, this interesting and high-born young lady was captured, with her mother, the Countess de Bourke, and her brother, by an Algerine rover, within sight of Spain; the Count de Bourke, her father, being then Ambassador from the French Court to that of Madrid.

A second disaster befel this unfortunate family, still more calamitous than the first. They were shipwrecked near Algiers. The Countess, her son, and all her suite, but her daughter, the steward, and her waiting woman, were unfortunately drowned; these individuals and four Turks being the only persons that survived the storm which they encountered. The three Christians were seized by the Caybalot, or revolted Moors, and carried away to the mountains of Cuoco, where they suffered the most cruel slavery, till redeemed by the Fathers of the Redemption, about three years afterwards, being the first Christian captives so liberated by that benevolent order.

In arranging this narrative, the author has closely followed the facts as detailed in "Accounts of Shripwrecks and Disasters at Sea," the old and valuable book from which she has derived them, and to which, with some few exceptions, she has faithfully adhered. She hopes the juvenile reading public will derive both pleasure and profit from the perusal of the trials to which one of their own age was subjected, and which she sustained so well.

CHRISTIAN ENDURANCE.

"GRANDMAMMA," cried Adolphe de T——, as he ran hastily to meet the venerable Countess, as she entered the picture gallery, leaning on her granddaughter's arm, "Grandmamma, I have found Adeline's portrait," directing her attention while he spoke to the painting in which he had discovered a likeness to his lovely young sister.

The subject of the painting was the capture of a lady and her family by an Algerine rover, whose commander had just taken possession of the cabin of the Genoese Tartane, and appeared to be addressing some encouraging words, to calm the fears of the unfortunate mother and her affrighted children. The young female, who did indeed bear a strange resemblance to Adeline de T——, was clinging to the maternal bosom, and half covering her eyes to shut out the sight of the sea robber, who had intruded himself into the cabin, at whose entrance more than one faithful servant had perished in guarding their mistress. The boy, resembling Adolphe in features and expression, exhibited something between natural courage and the timidity of his age. One arm was advanced in a bold and even threatening manner, while the other hand grasped his mother's garments with all the instinctive terror of infancy. Between the captive family and their conqueror stood a faithful servant, apparently interposing his person to guard them from any insult that might be offered to them on the part of the Corsair. Two female attendants, who were lying fainting on the floor, completed the mournful group.

There was something so inexpressibly touching in the picture, that Adolphe and his sister could not refrain from tears while they looked at it. The Countess wiped her aged eyes,—Adeline felt that she trembled. It was no common emotion that could thus affect her venerable progenitor.

"Adeline," again said Adolphe, but his tone was low, and only intended, this time, for his sister's ear, for he, too, had remarked his grandmother's agitation, but was too delicate to notice it, or even to wish to excite it again.

Adeline followed the direction of her brother's eyes, and still saw her own resemblance in a fainting female form, supported by the faithful attendant of the former scene. The first act of the drama was ended, but the second seemed more dreary, more terrible still. A barren rock, surrounded by boiling waves, a sinking ship, a group of miserable half-naked seamen, denoted the nature of the new calamity that had befallen the young creature whose misfortunes the whole series of paintings were intended to represent. It was a face and form of no common beauty that drooped over the servant's arm, the long golden ringlets hung dripping and dishevelled upon her shoulders and bosom. Even in her swoon, her mental agony seemed unforgotten. Was she an orphan? had shipwreck, still more cruel than captivity, left her to struggle with her hard fate alone?

The Countess perceived the anxious curiosity of her young relatives; she did not, however, explain, at that moment, the subjects of the paintings. Still holding Adeline by the arm, she advanced to the end of the gallery; she drew aside the curtain, and then quitting her granddaughter, walked to a distant window.

A rocky beach was here represented, a sea covered with wrecks, a savage turbaned group regarding a dead female, whose arms still enfolded a beautiful boy.

“ Deep in her bosom lay his head,
 With half-shut violet eye;
 He had known little of her dread,
 Nought of her agony.”

The daughter, reserved for bitterer trials, was carried in the faithful servant's arms, whose hands passed firmly over her eyes, prevented them from seeing the extent of her misfortunes.

There was yet another picture, which represented the interior of a chapel. Before the altar, the same young female was kneeling, with hands clasped and eyes upraised to Heaven. She was surrounded by a crowd of people, Turks, Jews, Armenians, Europeans, and priests, but seemed unconscious of every thing but her great deliverance. The fashion of her garments was oriental, but her attitude, her raptured devotion, showed that the redeemed captive was a Christian still.

"These paintings, my dear children, represent only too faithfully the history of my early life," said the Countess, advancing to meet her grandchildren. "I was young and fair as Adeline, when these adventures befel me; but the arm of the Lord succoured me. He brought me out of the land of bondage, and restored me to my father and country again."

"I think I have heard nurse say that you, dear grandmamma, had been a slave in Africa; but she never told the particulars," replied Adeline.

"She did not know them, my dear child, and you have been brought up at a distance from me.

However, if you wish to hear this disastrous narrative, I will endeavour to recal even the minutest incident. I am now in extreme old age, but the leading events of my captivity are as fresh in my memory as if they only happened yesterday."

"Then you will tell us the whole story," cried Adolphe. "Ah, now I know why your pictures are like Adeline; how I long to hear all about your captivity, dear grandmamma."

The Countess led her young descendants into her boudoir, whose windows overlooked the sunny fields and vine-clad hills of her own beautiful Provence, and seating herself beside them, contemplated them with the affectionate smile of a doting grandmother, commenced her history in these words—

"My father was, as you already know, of Irish descent, but ennobled, by the French monarch, as the Count de Bourke, for his military and diplomatic services. He had been some years Ambassador at the Court of Madrid; but my mother and her family, consisting of myself and a young brother, lived with my grandmother, at her chateau, not far from Aix. The troubled state of the Peninsula, and the delicacy of my health, had hitherto prevented mamma from joining her lord; but when I was near thirteen, I grew healthy, and, all obstacles being happily removed, she determined on joining the count, who was anxiously expecting her arrival at Madrid.

“A Genoese Tartane, handsomely fitted-up by government, was appointed to convey us to Spain. We embarked at Marseilles, whither my dear grandmother, Madame Varenne, and my uncle accompanied us. Taking leave of these dear relations was the first sorrow I had ever known. I had not seen my father since the birth of my brother, and the kind Marquis had always supplied his place to me. Madame Varenne was the kindest and most indulgent of all grandmamas, and the tears I then shed in her arms, were the only bitter ones that had ever fallen from my eyes. We embarked with a fair wind, the waves danced and glittered in the sun, reflecting the deep blue of the clear cloudless heavens above them. The bustle on deck, the novelty of the scene around us, made my brother and myself forget our childish grief. Mamma smiled too, through the soft tears that stood in her beautiful eyes, for she was hastening to meet the husband of her choice, and to present his children to him. Her sweet face resembled, at that moment, an April sky; even at this distance of time, I recal her to my mind, lovely and amiable as she then appeared. Yes, best of mothers! your image is still bright and fresh in my memory as ever, as we stood, hand in hand, gazing upon the receding shores of France!

"We suffered no inconvenience on the voyage as yet, all was fair and prosperous. The magnificence of the state cabin, the homage paid us as the children of the Ambassador, quite turned our young heads; and when the cry of 'land, land,' met our ears, we ran upon deck quite wild with joy. Here we were joined by mamma, and as we could see the coast of Spain with the naked eye, and even inhaled the perfumed breezes from the shore, we all naturally concluded our voyage was nearly at an end. At this moment a second cry chilled our hearts with terror. 'A Corsair a-head! a Corsair a-head, bearing down upon us!'

"I clung to mamma; Adolphe was less alarmed; though little more than six years old, he was a bold little fellow. 'Come, leave off crying, Victorine, we will fight the ship. Marèchal Berwick gave me a sword, I will run and fetch it to defend you.' Mamma gently detained the brave child, and wiping the tears from my eyes, bade us 'be assured that, within sight of shore, no Algerine rovers dared attack us.' Jaques M——, the steward, told us the same thing, and I became more calm.

"The appearance of two armed Turkish row-boats destroyed our fancied security, they rapidly approached the vessel, leaving us no other alternative than death or slavery. I withdrew with mamma and my brother into the state cabin. Ah, how gladly would we now have exchanged all its magnificence for the poorest hut in Spain or our own beloved Provence!

"The contest was short, the navigators of our unfortunate vessel threw themselves flat upon the deck, to avoid the broadside poured in by the enemy. The domestics, mostly grown old in the service of my grandfather, vigorously, though vainly, defended their lady and her family. Never shall I forget the noise, the cries of triumph, or of execration, carried on in various dialects, the terrific sound of the fire-arms, the groans of the wounded and dying, which then stunned our affrighted ears. My mother, always pious, passed these dreadful moments in prayer; I repeated the words she uttered, without having any distinct idea of their meaning, so bewildered were my faculties with terror. A momentary silence ensued, and then a wild barbarous shout announced our captivity. Another instant and the combat was renewed at the door of the cabin, which was burst open with violence, and the bodies of two of our

the rin his def
the con stew and this tha her with back ing stew
tures her her viour certai his se was u
"M remem

our defenders rolled in, the steward, rushing in at the same moment with the captain of the Algerine rover, with matchless fidelity stood between his lady and the infuriated barbarian, resolved to defend her and her children with his life.

“This scene, my dear children, is the subject of the first picture of the series you have just been contemplating. Jaques M——, was the faithful steward represented in the painting, my preserver and guardian in my painful captivity.

“In the wreck of all her hopes, in the midst of this slaughter, my dear mother evinced a courage that was not of this world, the fruits, indeed, of her late communion with God in prayer. While with a look she tried to soothe my fears, she drew back my brother’s advanced arm, and then, turning to the barbarian chief, she signed to the steward to deliver up his sword, and by her gestures seemed to demand that respectful treatment her high rank required. Whether the richness of her dress, her beauty, or the dignity of her behaviour, influenced this barbarian, I know not; but certainly he gave us very civil treatment, laying his sabre at our feet, which, but a moment before, was uplifted to take the steward’s life.

“My mother, who spoke Italian fluently, now remembered that it was probably understood by our captor, as she had heard, it was frequently used as a means of communication in the Levant. She addressed him in that language, and found he could converse in it with readiness. He used, to be sure, many words my mother could not understand, intermingling it with a barbarous patois, called Lingua Franca; but the steward, who had been up the Straits in his youth, comprehended him without difficulty, and interpreted these phrases to his mistress.

“Mamma discovered to the Corsair her name and rank, and demanded to be sent on shore. She pleaded the rights of nations, and assured him that her quality of French Ambassadors must render her capture as dangerous as it was unlawful. She then offered him a large ransom, on condition that he landed her on the coast of Spain or France, and concluded, by showing her passport, which ought to have secured her from any attack of this kind.

“In reply, the infidel told her he was the Dey’s servant, and dared not act against his master’s authority, but must instantly convey her and her family to Algiers.

“My mother changed colour, her spirits sank, she began to weep. The barbarian was touched by her tears, he assured her that she had nothing to fear ; he even gave her the chance of remaining on board the Tartane, or of accompanying him to his own vessel. He advised the former, and mamma followed his advice by staying where she was. The unfortunate Tartane was then manned by Turks, and her course altered for Algiers.

“ It was a great consolation for mamma that the steward remained with her, for Jaques M—— was one of the best men in the world, uniting a clear sound head to an excellent heart. He consoled her, by stating ‘the probability of a re-capture before the Tartane reached Algiers ; and the probability, even if they were not so fortunate, that the Dey would not dare to detain an Ambassadors from a powerful Christian court, to another equally potent.’

“ We were within a few hours’ sail of Algiers when a furious gale sprang up, which divided us from the Corsair. We were soon, either from the ignorance of our navigators, or the violence of the storm, driven out of our course ; and, to use the expressive words of the holy apostle, ‘were in jeopardy.’ Whether a presentiment of approaching death, or the dread of separation, weighed most heavily upon my mother’s mind, at this period, I cannot determine, but she began to give much maternal counsel, mingled with many tears.

‘Victorine,’ said she, ‘I have hoped all along that some unexpected deliverance would arise ; but now I feel an assurance in my own mind that either death or long captivity awaits me. We may be separated, and you deprived of a mother’s guardianship, be thrown among infidels, who will mock your Saviour, and endeavour to seduce you from the Christian faith. You are young and thoughtless ; you have, perhaps, never seriously reflected upon these great truths you have known from your cradle. Now is the time to lay them to heart. Keep them, my darling girl ; and though slavery, persecution, and even death await thee, thou wilt be happy hereafter ; but forsake Him who died for thee, and shame here and future retribution will be thy portion. Yes, Victorine, God will, I trust, preserve thy honour ; but thou art too young and fair for the barbarous land, whither thou art carried a slave. Still, dear Victorine, I feel assured that thou wilt not forget thy Saviour ; but this child is yet in infancy, and when I reflect upon what he may become, I confess I would rather hold him dead in my arms than see him an apostate.’

“I could not speak ; the idea of being separated from my mother had never entered my mind ; the thought now agonised me, I threw myself upon her bosom, and burst into a flood of tears. My brother caught up her last words.

“ ‘Am I really a slave, mamma?’ asked he, ‘and will these wicked Turks carry me away from you, and put chains on me? Why, what will papa do to them when he finds it out? What will he say when he hears what has become of us? And will they take me and Victorine from you?’

“This innocent prattle overpowered my mother, she caught us both in her arms, and shed over us those tears affectionate parents only pour over their offspring, ‘My children, oh! my children,’ she murmured, ‘what will become of you? and your father; oh! who shall tell him of our fate!’” These complaints were the first and last I ever heard her utter. ‘Thy will, O Lord, not mine, be done,’ was the prayer that rose instantly to her lips, so completely did faith enable her to gain the victory over the infirmities and tender weaknesses of human nature. This agony of maternal solicitude quickly subsided; calmer, holier feelings succeeded. She submitted herself to the decrees of God.

“Towards the evening of the third day, the furious gale rose to such a tremendous height; that no hope remained that the ship could weather the tempest. Our captors chewed opium, and resigned themselves to their fate. They struck off the irons from the limbs of their prisoners, and intrusted the navigation of the labouring vessel to them once more. We were moved into the stern cabin, for what reason I could never determine.

“I was so much distressed by sea-sickness, that I was obliged to keep my bed; my brother was no less affected than myself. My mother, I see her yet, as, with the warning voice of an angel, she cried to her terrified household, ‘Watch and pray; for ye know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh.’ As she knelt down, the terrified females clinging to her garments, the men prostrate in the humblest attitudes of devotion, she prayed aloud in the behalf of those present, with a fervency that seemed almost like inspiration. All appeared to feel that they were about to enter another world, upon whose portals they were kneeling. A cry, so wild, so despairing, here broke in upon us, and then a shock, a violent tremendous shock, followed,—the ship had struck upon the rocks. Springing from my cot, and seizing my brother, we rushed to mamma, who folded us tightly to her bosom; her arms were wound around us, I heard her say, ‘Even so come, Lord Jesus!’ Those words were her last. The

ff
ad eel he er-

at as ee el, nd
nen
the
the roose ke ere als
g, ent uck
and rho ere me,
The

PAUL & CO. 10

sh wa par cor me
pau depe follo gent of t rock him
it w succo life.
after,
"T ation, faithf
of the recove stewar my slip and m and di
Cold, l

ship parted in two, and the whole stern sunk; the water poured in, and divided me from my beloved parent for ever.

"Even at this distance of time, my children," continued the Countess, "I cannot recall the remembrance of that fatal night, without extreme pain. The rushing in of the strangling waters deprived me of sensation; of what immediately followed, I have no recollection. It seems that a gentleman attached to our suite was on that part of the vessel which was thrown high upon the rock. He distinguished something floating near him, and supposing, by the white garments, that it was a female, endeavoured to save me. He succeeded, though not without imperilling his own life. Poor gentleman! he lost it a few minutes after, in trying to swim ashore.

"This is the history of my wonderful preservation, which I learned, some hours after, from the faithful Jaques, who, fortunately for me, was one of the seven survivors on the rock. When I recovered consciousness, I found myself in the steward's arms, my only raiment my night-dress, my slippers still on my feet, my head uncovered, and my long ringlets hanging over his arm, wet and dishevelled, as represented in the painting. Cold, hungry, wet, half-naked, and sick with grief,

I passed that dreadful night in successive fainting fits. It was only at intervals I had my recollection, and then I wished to die. I murmured, I fretted against that awful Providence who had appointed me to these trials.

"The steward chid this rebellious spirit; he reminded me of my sainted mother's patience, of her faithful acquiescence to the decrees of the Almighty. I wept till I could weep no longer, but I dared not now repine. My mother's example spake to me, even from the grave.

"The long-wished-for, yet dreaded morning, came, bringing with it fresh misfortunes. We were within sight of Algiers, one of the finest cities in the world for appearance, as we viewed it from the water. The shipwrecked Turks made signals of distress, and awaited the expected aid from the shore, with far different feelings than the unhappy Christians, who looked forward to nothing but chains. The party on the rock consisted of four Turks, one of whom was the commander of the corsair, and three natives of France, the steward, myself, and Fanchette, my own maid. Several boats approached us from the shore, the foremost of which seized all the prisoners; the others began to plunder the wreck, but all left the Turks to shift as they could.

"The wild, savage-looking people into whose hands I had fallen, called themselves Cabayles, or revolted Moors; they resided in the lofty mountains of Cuoco, under the government of their own Sheik; and, safe amidst those wild crags and cliffs, resolutely maintained their own independence, in defiance of the Dey, and the whole power of Algiers. The Sheik, or chief, of these wild hordes, exercised the authority of a barbaric king over them. That is, he led them to battle, and provided for the exigencies of the horde or tribe; but over their savage actions he had no control. The high priest, or Marabout, as he was called, was their lawgiver, but he was obliged to wink at the infringement of his laws; and as they implicitly followed his superstitious tenets, he did not care how much ill-will they showed to each other, or attempt to ameliorate their cruelty to their miserable captives.

"As soon as we reached the shore, the person who appeared to be the leader of the party, took me from the steward, and pulled off one of my slippers, in token that I was now his slave, Jaques made signs to him to treat me kindly; and gathering up a double-handful of pebbles from the beach, repeatedly pointing to me, intending to convey to my master some idea of the great ransom

he might obtain for me. My captor nodded in return, and seeing that I required food, gave me some bread, some dates, and a bottle of water. He then restored me my shoe, and we commenced our march towards the mountains.

“For some time, our route lay along the sea-beach, which was strewn with the mournful memorials of the wreck. In an agony of grief, I examined the lifeless features of the dead, expecting to behold the dear loved remains of my mother and brother. Many a well-known familiar face met my view, but not those I sought for. My preserver lay cold and lifeless there; and how sorely did I long to throw myself down beside him, and give up the life he had prolonged, which seemed, at this bitter moment, an intolerable burden. On my uncovered head the burning rays of the noon-day sun shone with unmitigated fierceness; my feet were blistered, my spirit was overwhelmed, fearfulness and trembling came upon me. The steward saw the fatigue and anguish I endured; he took me up in his arms; he comforted, he consoled me; he spoke of my father, and bade me try to live for him. The good man wept over me; he was suffering hunger, thirst, and toil; but in tender sympathy for me, he evidently forgot his own misery. Excellent man, how do I love and venerate thee ! how dear is thy memory to me still ! My eyes, long dimmed with weeping, could then scarcely distinguish even near objects ; well was it for me, that they did not behold the cruel sight that must have met them, but for the precaution my kind friend took.

“ At a distance from the other victims of the last fatal night, lay my beloved mother and brother. Her arms were wound round him, his head was nestled in her bosom, death had not divided them ; the flower and the bud were frozen together, in the icy clasp of death. The separation she had dreaded, had not taken place,—the lamb of Christ’s fold was gathered unto the Great Shepherd, together with his Christian parent. A shriek from Fanchette, a yell of eagerness and triumph from the savage Moors, raised my feeble energies ; I tried to raise my head to discover the cause of these outcries ; but the steward passed his hands firmly over my eyes, and saved me from the horror of that sight. How could I have seen the rings torn from those lovely hands, that beautiful face rudely examined, those insensible remains insulted and defaced, and lived or retained my reason ! Happy spirit ! what were these outrages to thee ? Thyself and thy child were then with God, singing the song of the redeemed, and rejoicing in His light, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

The Countess was again dreadfully agitated; for a few moments her feelings appeared to overpower her; but she soon collected herself, and resumed her narrative.

"I did not learn these particulars till some days afterwards, when they were told me by Fanchette, who disguised nothing from me, but told her tale with a frightful minutes that harrowed me to the soul. It was only in the first days of my journey, that I bitterly lamented the death of my sainted parent and cherub brother. Alas! the barbarous usage I endured in slavery, soon made me remember with gratitude, that they were spared the miseries I underwent.

"We at length turned our backs upon the sea, and began to ascend the rugged heights that led to the mountains, whither our master intended us to sojourn for a time. His own home lay at a large town, called Bujeyer, where he finally intended to sell us, if he could not obtain a sufficient ransom for our persons. The sheik to whose care he meant to intrust us, was a covetous, uncivilized barbarian, who no sooner saw us, than he picked a quarrel with my master, and laying hold upon me, insisted that the booty he had got from the wreck, was more than his share, and that the prisoners should be for him. The enraged Moor swore that I was a Spaniard of high rank, and that, rather than give me up, he would cut off my head. He drew his sabre, and catching me by my long hair, would certainly have put his threat into execution, if the faithful steward had not seized his arm, and made signs that by so doing he would lose my ransom. The incensed Moor dropped the weapon, and finding that the party of the shiek was far more numerous than that he commanded, collected his goods and followers, and took the way to his native city, leaving us in hands far more barbarous and uncivilized than his own.

“For six days we pursued our toilsome way, till the steward told me we were near our future home. Home! the slave has no home! but this sad truth I had yet to learn from the bitter teaching of experience. Worn with incessant toil, I pined for rest, and almost participated in the joy that lighted up the savage countenances of the shiek and his followers.

“With the name of woman, every thing tender and endearing was combined. They had children, and could feel for one thus early deprived of a mother's care, a mother's love; I did not know that a debasing slavery and intolerant religion deprived the female savage of every softer feeling, leaving her little of her sex but a fierce kind of maternity. Yes, dear Adeline, it is to the Christian religion we owe all our attractive qualities, all our privileges; wherever the gospel is not preached, woman is an abject slave, often as wicked as she is helpless. But to resume my tale: Fanchette, no less sanguine than myself, comforted me with the prospect of obtaining rest and refreshment. Poor girl, she paid me the same attention now I was a fellow slave with herself, as formerly when I had a right to command her services. The steward's information was quite correct, (he had it from an Italian renegade slave belonging to the shiek,) and towards evening we entered the hamlet, where our new master's family dwelt.

"The whole population, headed by his wife and children, came out to meet him with songs of joy and triumph, and to mock the Christian captives he had brought with him. The women, from whom I had hoped to find some compassion, loaded us with insults and abuse; they set their great dogs upon us, and laughed at the agony of terror Fanchette and I were in when these monstrous beasts fastened upon us, and made us feel their fangs. The name of Christian seemed to extinguish every spark of pity in their flinty bosoms. They pointed to their large fires with gestures that showed them to be desirous of putting us to a cruel death. Indeed, these women seemed to hold the female sex in contempt, for they confined their malice to Fanchette and me, contenting themselves with spitting in the steward's face, calling him hard names, and throwing him some bones to pick, thus reducing him to the level of their dogs. They pinched, and harassed us so cruelly, that we were ready to die with fatigue and terror.

"The steward, who saw my great distress, pointed it out to our new master, who put a stop to the cruel sport, by commanding the principal instigator, his own wife, Gulbeyaz, to conduct me to her residence, and to give me something to eat.

"This haughty woman, who was handsome, and rather majestic in her person, gathered her garments tightly round her, as fearing some contamination from my touch, and made signs to me to follow her to her dwelling. She pointed to a mat in a remote corner, on which I sat down, and taking some raw parsnips from a basket, flung me the green tops, laughing heartily at my evident disappointment. Fatmè, her daughter, a pretty girl of my own age, joined in her mother's cruel mockery. Heart-sick and weary, I closed my eyes, and fell asleep.

"Early the following morning, I was awakened by feeling my long hair pulled, and found myself assailed by five of my mistress's impish progeny, who pinched and scratched me unmercifully. Enraged at this usage, I shook the children rudely off, and sent them roaring to their mother, who flew upon me like an infuriated tigress, and left me fainting from the effect of her blows.

"When I recovered my recollection, the sheik and his family were taking their morning repast; Fanchette and the steward were sitting eating some black bread, at a humble distance, casting from time to time looks of tender compassion upon me. The sheik ordered Fatmè to give me a little milk and water, and a barley cake: she was forced to obey his commands, but she rudely spit in my face, to show how averse she was to offer me the common offices of humanity.

"My scanty meal ended, Gulbeyaz sent me, with two of her slaves, to draw water from a neighbouring well. And now, my dear children, I displayed a want of sense, in trying to evade the duties of my new situation. I had been delicately brought up, and had never even dressed myself, washed my own hands, or indeed performed those little offices for myself which even young ladies of quality should be accustomed to do. You, Adeline, at my request, have been educated more usefully, and are quite independent of your waiting woman; but my helpless hands were now called upon to perform servile work for others, which had disdained the lightest toil for my own advantage. I refused the task allotted to me with passionate indignation; I hoped to provoke my captors to destroy me, so much did I long to escape, by death, from the life of bitter bondage that awaited me. Fanchette seemed determined to assert her dignity as lady's maid, with as much obstinacy as her young mistress did that of a nobleman's and ambassador's daughter. The consequences may be easily guessed, we were beaten, starved, and at night turned out of the hut, exposed to the noxious dews, and fierce attacks of the muskitoes."

"Why did not you try to escape, dear grandma?" asked Adolphe.

"Alas! whither could we flee, my child?" replied the Countess; "and indeed, if we were so inclined, dogs followed us wherever we went, ready to seize us in their fangs, if we strayed beyond the limits of the hamlet. At first, we wandered about in great affliction, wringing our hands, and speaking of the lamented dead, and of that dear France we dared not hope to see again. While indulging our grief, we came suddenly upon the steward, who was at prayer, under a tree. Our sobs disturbed his devotion, he arose from his knees, and came to meet us. The brilliant moon shone full upon his countenance, a holy calmness seemed to rest upon his brow; his whitened hair, blached in the service of my family, denoted a green old age; his strength was still as unbroken, his head as cool, his heart as warm as in early youth. As he advanced towards us, he reminded me of the saints and martyrs of primitive times. He bowed respectfully to me, and addressed me thus,— ‘Mademoiselle De Bourke, my dear young lady, it is for you I have been praying: how is it that I find you here, and in such trouble?’

“I sobbed while I related the cause. He shook his head, and turning to Fanchette, sharply reproved her: ‘this poor child does not see the consequences of her rashness, and she knows not the use of her delicate hands; but you who were taken from the sheepfold and the vineyard to wait upon her, only return to labours to which you have been accustomed. Poor Victorine, poor child, you must subdue this rebellious spirit,’ continued he; ‘you must endeavour to perform the tasks imposed upon you in this house of bondage, for in so doing you will fulfil the will of your Heavenly Father ; He has appointed you to these trials, and He can help you as He did Joseph in Egypt ; He can be with you, as He was with him. Dry up your tears, my child, and pray with me for submission to the Divine will ; to-morrow, set about your labours diligently, as performing them, not unto man, but unto God.'

"I motioned to Fanchette to kneel down by me, my heart was too full to speak. The old man prayed in the fulness and deep sincerity of his heart for me, and with me. He spake of a Saviour's love ; and besought Him to deliver us, as He had all His servants, who called upon Him in the hour of their extremity.

"Young as I was, and self-willed as I was, the prayers and exhortations of this good man sunk deep into my heart. His example encouraged me ; I began to think of that Heavenly rest, which was yet in store for the slave ; I promised to follow his advice ; I called him my father, in truth, he behaved like a father to me.

"Seeing how matted and dishevelled my hair hung about me, (for I had lost all my clothes and necessities in the shipwreck,) he gave me his pocket-comb, and with the assistance of Fanchette and his knife, reduced my refractory ringlets into something like order. He comforted me by assuring me that if it were possible to acquaint the French consul, at Algiers, with my situation, I should not remain long in this doleful captivity; adding that, among the followers of the sheik, there was an Italian renegade, who had promised to convey a letter to the consul, the first opportunity that might occur. The good man then took an ink-horn from his pocket, and his account book, which articles he had been permitted to retain, because his captors knew not their use, and advised me to add a few lines to a letter he had already written on a blank leaf he had torn from it.

“My dear grandchildren will wonder how I acquitted myself of this task at midnight, but I was aided by the light of a brilliant moon, whose beams shone with unclouded splendour, almost blinding me with their brightness. Indeed, the words of the Psalmist are beautifully applicable when remembered in a climate like that in which I was then a sojourner: ‘The sun shall not smite thee by day, or the moon by night,’* as any person sleeping with their faces uncovered in the open air exposed to the moonbeams, run the risk of blindness, Sitting under a tree, and resting the book on my knee, in lieu of a desk, I corroborated the steward's statement, and implored Monsieur Dusault to inform my father of my present condition, if he would not venture to redeem me himself.

* Sir Robert Keer Porter quotes this verse of the 121st Psalm, in speaking of the effect of moonlight, in Egypt.—See his Travels.

"My task executed, a ray of hope sprang up in my heart, and after committing myself to the care of Heaven, I rested my head against the bosom of Fanchette, and slept for some hours sweetly and profoundly. A strange incident, as unexpected as it was frightful, nearly consigned me to that deeper slumber which the coming of the Lord alone can break. A fanatical, wicked old woman, tormented by the evil workings of her own conscience, imagined that the murder of a Christian would atone for some of the enormities of her former life, and, haunted by the recollection of some ancient crime, wandered about at some seasons like a fury, armed with a hatchet. Among the Mahometans, the insane are held in great reverence, and all their sayings are considered as oracular; for which reason, this creature, (who, I believe, was mad from wickedness) was suffered to be at large. While roaming abroad, she perceived me lying on the bosom of Fanchette; and, catching me by my long curls, was about to strike off my head, when my cries brought the steward to my assistance, who shook the vile old woman violently, seized her hatchet, and drove her away.

"Thus through his courage, promptitude, and fidelity, was I a second time preserved from decapitation. I could not help weeping while I directed Fanchette to cut off my hair close to my head, with the steward's knife, for how proud had my dear mother been of these fine golden ringlets, which she loved to dress herself! and how often had my dear lost Adolphe sportively threaded them, and even kissed them with infantine affection. Now, to retain them, was to risk my life since they had afforded a secure hold to two assassins within a few days. Yet I childishly wept when I saw them lying on the ground, and felt as if I could no longer identify myself without them.

"I promised the steward that I would endeavour to perform the tasks allotted to me, for hope again waved her golden pinions round my head. The consul would receive my letter, and I should be free. The assembling of the sheik's household was destined to renew my grief. The sight of my close-cropped head enraged the barbarian, who struck me several hard blows; for the females, among the Moors, account their long hair as their greatest ornament, and the loss of mine would greatly diminish my value, were he inclined to sell me. The women mocked me, and the children hooted me, Gulbeyaz contented herself with holding up a bright tin mirror, which she wore suspended to her girdle, with an air of quiet malice, which vexed me more than the taunts and laughter of the rest.

"I had been considered one of the loveliest girls in France, and was by no means unconscious of my personal charms. The sight of my own reflection in Gulbeyaz's mirror, was sufficient to cure me of vanity for ever. It was no longer Victorine De Bourke I saw, but a young creature as black as a gipsey, with naked feet and legs, a man's waistcoat fastened round her waist, no hat, and bright golden hair clipped, or rather notched round her face, and large blue eyes staring out of a famished, affrighted countenance. Yet so ridiculous was my appearance, that I actually laughed; perhaps the remembrance of what I was, and what I had been, excited this unnatural risibility; but there was no pleasure in my mirth. I forgot to tell you that my upper garment was furnished by the steward; it was fastened with a hemp cord, because the sheik had taken a fancy to the buttons.

"Gulbeyaz was so charmed with my mortification, that she gave me some bread and milk for breakfast, and sent me, with Fanchette and a male slave, to draw water, I conscientiously endeavoured to keep my word, so solemnly pledged to Jaques; but the fatigue was dreadful, and my face and hands were terribly blistered by the sun; I had no bonnet, and now doubly regretted my long hair which had hitherto defended my neck and face from the heat. Faint and exhausted, I sunk down by the side of a palm tree, that grew near the fountain. Here the steward found me, and taking his handkerchief off his neck, tied it round my head: he gave me some berries which he had found, that were edible, told me that the renegade had dispatched our letter to the consul, congratulating me on the prospect of speedy deliverance, and bidding me be of good comfort. Surely, my dear children, this man was like a second father to me.

"In the evening we were employed in milking the goats. Fanchette, who could milk, undertook to teach me. We secretly drank some of the milk, when Gulbeyaz's back was towards us, and felt all the better for our repast. As the kids had only that day been taken off two of her best milch goats, our mistress did not suspect us, but thought the creatures held up their milk from affection to their young. Fanchette, who was a farmer's daughter, was, however, too well versed in rural affairs for this to happen with her. We began to recruit our strength a little, for if we had not lived upon our wits, we should have been literally starved. The worst part of slavery is the dishonesty and immorality it occasions. Necessity made me steal, but I had too much fear of God before my eyes to lie, Fanchette was less scrupulous. Ours was a hard lot while together, but, alas! mine was soon rendered more bitter by a separation from these faithful servants, who had held by me in my evil days as in my happier ones.

"The arrival of a strange merchant, with coffee, spices, shawls, silks, opium, and pipes deprived me of these worthy creatures. Gulbeyaz took a fancy to a superb shawl, and, with the permission of the sheik, exchanged Fanchette and the steward for this piece of finery. We had been, now, two months in these mountains, and had acquired a smattering of the barbarous Moresco these people spoke, and but too soon understood the nature of this cruel bargain. For the two individuals principally concerned, any change was for the better. The merchant looked mild, and intelligent, and more like a civilized being than any thing I had yet seen in Africa. But, for me, their departure was a calamity bitterer than death. I forgot all differences between our rank, while I hung weeping round their necks, in an agony of despair. The steward wept over me, and blessed me; he gave me his ink-horn and account-book, (which I put in my bosom,) charging me to keep sending letters to the French consul, till I received an answer; telling me to confide in the Italian renegade, who would keep sending them to Algiers by persons travelling thither. He exhorted me to be patient and tractable, and to endeavour to gain the friendship of the wild people with whom I was a slave. 'I have not been ill-treated, my dear child, because I have lent my shoulder to the wheel, and, forgetting my former condition, looked before me, instead of behind.—This, dear and beloved daughter of my sainted mistress, you must do, if you wish for kind treatment. Even in this wilderness of woe, God will be with you, as He was with Joseph in all his afflictions.'

"To these words I made no reply but these words, 'I shall be left alone—alone, with savage Pagans,' wringing my hands, and clinging fast to those humble but faithful friends, whom I believed I should never behold more.

"The steward solemnly blessed me, and again entreated me to be comforted; but my choking grief prevented me from hearing his last words, or taking a last look at him and poor Fanchette.

"Suddenly, a strange ringing sounded in my ears: a mist came over my sight. I lost all sensation, even that of sorrow; and when I recovered consciousness, they were gone, and I was alone.

"I cannot describe my feelings. I mechanically obeyed those about me, ate the course food they gave me, without appetite, drank without thirst, and moved about without any aim, excepting the impulse given me by those who were in authority over me. I ceased to pray. I was sinking into a state of apathy, almost of idiotcy, when I was accosted one day by the renegade, through whose means I had hoped to regain my liberty. He told me that he feared the letter he had entrusted to a fellow slave had miscarried, and advised me to write another. The sound of my own language, for he spoke to me in very broken French, roused me from the stupor of despair into which I had sunk. I wept, I acknowledged my ingratitude in forgetting that God, who still cared for me, and thanking my fellow slave, resolved to write to the consul that very day. No opportunity occurred till the family of the sheik were buried in repose. I usually slept on a mat near Fatmè's bed, and the rest of the sheik's progeny occupied the same apartment; a thin partition divided us from that occupied by my master and the ever-watchful Gulbeyaz, attentive to the least murmur uttered by her young children.

"At midnight, I crept from my mat, and taking out my writing materials, aided by the light of the moon, commenced my task. The narrative of my misfortunes took some considerable time to indite. I had not been used to letter writing, and actually took more pains to make my hand look neat, than the necessities of the case required, so that it took me several nightly vigils to complete my task. At length, I happily concluded it, and having actually folded and superscribed it, was putting it into my bosom, when I was siezed from behind, and turning round, beheld the sheik, who shook me violently, snatched it from me, and, worse than all, took away my writing materials. Then, taking me up in his arms, flung me violently on my mat, and retired grumbling to his own bed.

"This barbarous chief was very far from guessing the true use of the implements of which he had deprived me. Ignorant of the art of writing, he thought that the black marks I had made on the paper was a charm, to do him or his family an injury; and, carefully laying the letter and materials by, determined to wash out the writing very carefully, and make me drink it, to avert the mischief he imagined I wished to do him. This he accordingly did the following day, to my great distaste and mortification.

"He, however, gave me an opportunity of writing another letter, by desiring me to write a charm to wear round his neck, to prevent the assaults of the devil, of whom he was, with very good reason, much afraid. I took as much time about this charm as I possibly could, taking care to write two letters to the consul at the same time, one of which, I entrusted to the care of Murad, (as Marco Monti, the renegade, was called,) concealing the other in my bosom, in case the first should miscarry.

"My master was so much pleased with his charm, that he gave me a suit of coarse blue cotton, and promised me a turban, in case I should behave myself. I could scarcely refrain from laughing when I beheld the shiek suspend the writing round his neck, it being literally nothing more than a rough copy of the narrative of my own misfortunes, such as I had just given into Murad's hands.

"I had began to fare better for the authority with which the sheik's superstition had invested me, when the return of Aladin, his eldest son, was the occasion of fresh disasters to me, and more dreadful trials. This young savage, who had just attained to manhood, had already signalized himself by his great courage. He inherited a good deal of his mother's haughty character, as well as her fierce beauty ; and being lately returned from a military expedition against another wild tribe, was much extolled and humoured by his parents and people.

“Unfortunately for me, this youth took a liking to me, now fast stepping into early womanhood, and a still greater fancy for the handkerchief I wore round my head, which he insisted upon having. No other head-covering was given me in its place ; and though I reminded the sheik of his promise of a turban, or a veil, he refused to supply my loss, or to force his son to restore what he had so unjustly taken away, which was the pretty India handkerchief given me by the faithful steward. In France, the loss of a bonnet, or cap, is a great inconvenience ; but in Africa, a dreadful deprivation. I was obliged to assist the male slaves, that day, in harvesting the maize crop ; and, suddenly, was struck to the earth with a coup de soleil, fainted, and was carried home in a burning fever. The ignorant and inhuman sheik, as soon as he saw me, instead of considering my illness as the result of working bareheaded in the sun, imputed it to my having swallowed the water with which he had obliterated my former letter, which, you may remember, he took for a charm to bring some calamity upon his house, which had now, as he thought, returned upon my own head, by his prudent management. He imparted his suspicions to Gulbeyaz and his household; and the consequences of this absurd conjecture was, that I was left to shift for myself, or perish with hunger. By his direction, I was laid under a large tree, to live or die, as the event might chance to fall out, unpitied, uncared for, unsoothed.

“Yes, my dear grandchildren, such was the bitter lot of a daughter of wealth, power, and luxury,—one, who had never known want, sorrow, or toil, till the period of her bitter slavery. I passed through two dreadful nights; my lips were parched, each breath appeared to scorch me as I drew it in. I tried to pray, but the agony of thirst I suffered, choked my utterance. I endeavoured to raise my thoughts to my Saviour, and for a few moments felt cheered by the prospect that He ‘had opened the kingdom of Heaven to all true believers.’ My fast-increasing pains confused these consoling reflections. I saw streams of water I could not reach, and juicy grapes whose clusters vanished before they reached my lips. I saw—and this was no illusion,—the mountain vultures descend from the lofty crags, and wheel nearer and nearer to me, without the power to scare them away. I already felt their wings fan my cheek, when an angel, as I thought, came and drove them away, nor performed for me this good office alone, for she held a cup of milk to my parched lips, and bade me drink, and live.”

“An angel, dear grandmamma !” cried Adeline and Adolphe at once, in a tone of wonder, their tearful eyes expanding with amazement and awe. “God sent his angel, and delivered you, as He has delivered some of His saints* in their extremity.”

“The Lord did not work, my children, a visible miracle to preserve me, but He wrought a change in the heart of Fatmè, by means of the still small voice of conscience ; by the providence of a merciful God, Fatmè could not sleep that night, and her thoughts, during her vigils, reverted to me. She wondered if I yet lived ; and, without feeling, then, any pity, felt an ardent curiosity to know the fact, and stole out to the place where I lay gasping for breath, and tormented with agonizing pain. While she looked upon me, she was cut to the heart, for God inclined her to show me pity. She ran and milked one of the goats into a calabash, and held it to my lips. I received it as, what it was, a gift from Heaven, but my wandering and confused ideas led me to imagine that my preserver was an inhabitant of the skies. It seems she stayed with me all that night, bathing my face and hands with water, nor ceased her humane cares till the dawning of the day. These particulars I learned from her own lips afterwards, for it was some time before I recognised my benefactress in my foe, the hitherto haughty cruel daughter of the sheik.

* The reader must here remember that the speakers were Roman Catholics, who believe in the continuance of miracles in their church.

“Her feelings during my helpless weakness resembled those with which a mother regards her sick child. She continually stole to me, to bring me grapes, or dates, or limes, and the first glimpse I had of returning consciousness, revealed the features of Fatmè in those of my supposed guardian angel.

“The interest this young female now took in my fate, occasioned an alteration in the conduct of her parents; they now sent for me home, but I entreated to remain where I was, as the open air was far more agreeable to me than the close atmosphere of their crowded dwelling.

“While yet an invalid, with the shadow of death hovering about me, and suffering under the deep nervous depression that generally attends a long-protracted recovery, my thoughts frequently reverted to my lost mother, to my native Christian country, and to the fixed eternal state, into which I appeared, even then, entering. I had fully completed my fourteenth year, and had lost for ever the thoughtlessness and gaiety of childhood.

“Necessity had done the work of time: I was prematurely wise, because prematurely experienced. I carefully recalled to mind the religious instructions I had received from my dear mother and the ministers of religion, and how I pined for good books and godly Christian company. The first I found in that best, holiest book, which, though injudiciously restricted, in general, by the canons of our church, was life and health, and joy to me. In creeping, rather than walking from my sheltering tree, I stumbled in the high grass, over something which proved to be a book; on opening its damp, half-obliterated pages, I found it to be an old copy of the Geneva Bible. In an extasy of joy, I pressed it to my bosom. It bore a French name and ancient date on the title page. Probably, it had been the property of some slave, condemned to perish here, and had comprised his hope in life and death; his only treasure, as well as his only earthly possession. I began to read, to mark, to learn, to pray with great fervency. The day-spring from on high visited me.

"No longer disquieted about my present situation, I began to wish to be with God, from real love to Him, rather than, as hitherto, to escape the troubles of this life. Separated from my dear relatives, from my faithful servants, I could yet pray for them. And oh, my children, what a blessed privilege is that of prayer, 'that brings Heaven down to us, and raises us to Heaven.' The time of my convalescence, was, perhaps, the really happiest time of my life, because at no other period did I feel or enjoy such close communion with God in prayer.

"After my recovery, I grew considerably taller; all the blackness I had acquired in the sun, wore off; my hair, once more, fell on my face and shoulders, in profuse ringlets of nature's curling; and Aladin, that self-willed, obstinate youth, began to talk of asking me for a wife, of his father. The sheik was undecided whether to sell me to some rich man, to wait for my friends seeking me out, and ransoming me, or to give me to his heir, now marriageable.

“In the mean while, having received no answer to my second letter, I dispatched my third, still hoping to prove a happier fortune than to be the wife of a future sheik.

“My master, though still undecided how to dispose of me to the best advantage, determined to make me keep the personal advantages I unfortunately possessed. He made me wear a black horse-hair veil, with only a single aperture, large enough to admit one of my eyes, whenever I went abroad, and would suffer me to perform no outdoor work. Milking the goats, amusing the children, and nursing a lovely female infant Gulbeyaz had just brought him, was all the employment now expected from me. My dress consisted of blue cotton trowsers, a caftan, or robe, and vest of the same stuff, a turban, or more properly speaking, a high Syrian cap, with a muslin veil wound round it, exactly resembling those curious head-dresses worn in Europe from the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries, and which you know are still retained in Normandy by the peasantry, and are called cauchoise,—red leather slippers, without any stockings, completed my attire.

"The children grew fond of me, and shared with me, unasked, their bread and milk; even the dogs became tame and familiar. Fatmè was my faithful friend, Gulbeyaz mingled some kindness with her severe manners, the slaves were respectful, and Aladin more determined to make me his wife than ever.

"More than a twelvemonth had elapsed since my captivity: my condition was certainly much ameliorated. I began to speak the Moorish language fluently, and, but for my daily studies in the scriptures, should probably soon have lost my mother tongue.

"The great influence I had acquired over the mind of Fatmè, and the affection of her brothers and sisters, led me to try whether I could not render them more humane and gentle in their manners. My remonstrances, when they used harsh words or blows to the slaves, or fought with other children of their own age, began to take effect; and as they became kinder to those about them, they were less troublesome to their own parents. Even Gulbeyaz acknowledged that they improved under my care. I began to teach Fatmè my own language. It is true, I had but one book, but that was the best, and, perhaps, even the easiest from which I could teach her.

The parables, which I translated to her and the children, delighted them as stories, and I tried to make them comprehend the moral they inculcated. The customs of these wild tribes made these beautiful lessons appear easier to their comprehension than even to Europeans of the same age, because more in keeping with their usual habits.

“The sincere Christian is always a philanthropist, and the same love that brought Jesus Christ from heaven, still actuates His humblest follower to diffuse the knowledge of the Gospel to whoever will give it a hearing. This spirit of Christian benevolence made the apostles travel into distant countries, made them face a thousand perils, to give light to those that sat in darkness and the shadow of death, and, finally, attest the truth of their doctrine with their blood. I could not see Fatmè daily invoke the false prophet, without feeling my young heart stirred within me. I spoke, and my servile condition, although it could not quench my zeal, moderated and kept it in the due bounds of prudence. The Lord inclined Fatmè to listen, and even in this desert wilderness I enjoyed the company of a Christian friend.

“I now began to think that it was the intention of Providence that I should remain in Africa; yet the prospect of being the wife of Aladin, was by no means a cheering one. His fierce bigotry turned away with scorn from the pure doctrines of the Holy Jesus; and had he known that Fatmè had imbibed them from me, he would have sacrificed us both upon the spot. I could entertain no hope of winning to my own faith a spouse of such a temper. As it was, his vehement love scarcely saved me from his furious zeal for the honour of Mahomet. I shall never forget how cruelly he grasped my arm, when he finally told me to name the Nazarine no more, leaving a black circle round my wrist, as a constant memorial for months of his prohibition.

"I told Fatmè of the circumstance, and entreated her to procure the writing materials of which her father had deprived me, that I might make a last attempt to gain my liberty. She wept at the idea of losing me, yet granted my request. I found, to my great mortification, that the ink was nearly dried up, and that the book from which I had hitherto obtained my paper, was entirely marred by mice. I tore a blank leaf from the Bible, and wrote my last appeal to the French consul. The exhausted state of my writing materials gave me no hope of ever inditing another. I fastened it with one of my own long ringlets, and resolved to wait for a favourable answer. I neither doubted Monti's fidelity nor good-nature, yet he had hitherto been completely unsuccessful.

"While pondering over this matter, the renegade accosted me upon the very subject next my heart. I remembered that I had never made him or his colleague any promise, and now, resolving to ensure the safe deliverance of my epistle, I promised, in my father's name, freedom, and a handsome sum as their reward in case of my ransom. Monti's eyes brightened, and he took my letter, saying, with tears in his eyes, 'Ah, Signora, it is not the hope of liberty alone that makes me desirous of serving you; it is because you have kept the Christian faith undefiled in the midst of persecution and contempt. Oh, that I had been thus constant, and then the sorrows of my eventful life would not be embittered by remorse. Mine is a strange history.'

"I expressed a desire to know his story, and he related it to me, as near as I can recollect, in these words:

"'Ten long years have elapsed in woful slavery in this heathen land, yet the recollection of my native Italy is as dear as ever to my heart. I think of my mother and brethren till a mist comes over my eyes, and my senses are bewildered and wandering. A thick cloud hangs over my soul; I try to pray, but then my outward apostacy seems to forbid me to address that awful Being whose creed I have renounced. They call me here 'Monti, the Renegade.' Alas! what an infamous designation for one whose brow was signed in baptism with the blessed symbol of redemption! It was not thus they named me in my own sunny clime.

" 'I frighten you, Signora; mine is a dreadful story, and I want nerve to tell it out; yet I must make an effort, for the secret weighs upon my mind, like lead. I was born on the estate of Conte Bernardo Manfredonia, younger brother to the Duca of that noble house, and my eyes first opened on the blue waters of the Venetian gulf. My parents, though not affluent, were in good circumstances, for my father commanded a galley belonging to the Conte, and my mother was nurse to that nobleman's only son. I was some years older than my foster brother, who was a child of great beauty and still greater promise. Leoni Manfredonia was indeed a bold, frank, generous creature, the darling of his father's vassals, who delighted to witness his infant daring, and loved his sunny temper.

" 'The Conte himself was an austere man, much feared, but little beloved. His young son engrossed all his affection, he had neither friendship nor liking for any other living thing. On the death of the Duca, the guardianship of his nephew devolved upon him; and the weakly constitution, and, perhaps, feeble character of the little Duca, inspired him with hopes of succeeding to the territories and titles of Manfredonia. As it was, he ruled, or rather reigned, in the castle, in the name of the young Amadeo; and some thought that the boy would find it no easy matter to get his inheritance out of his uncle's hands.

“ ‘ Nothing could be more unlike our master's son than the Duca, and yet the love Leoni Manfredonia bore him was strong as death; and as the Duca was regarded with coldness and aversion by his uncle, and treated with little respect by the very menials who ate his bread, his heart clave to his generous cousin. Leoni, indeed, was the column that sheltered and protected his feeble branches. I, who had the honour to serve my foster brother, can testify to the truth of his affection.

“ ‘ The born vassals of the young Duca took no interest in their young lord. Leoni was their favourite, and many openly expressed their hopes that the handsome high-spirited son of Conte

Bernardo Manfredonia might become their head. The object of these rash wishes was the only person who did not share the general feeling. It was sweet to him to extricate his cousin from those difficulties and dangers into which he had rashly plunged himself. There could be no rivalry between them, for timid as Amadeo was, he always followed the lead of our young hero. He had, among many other fears, a great dread of the water, and his very first attempt at swimming had liked to have proved fatal to him. It was his heir who resolutely supported his exhausted frame, and, at the risk of his own life, brought him safe to shore.

“ ‘ This brave feat pleased his father little, but the sickly constitution of his nephew received so severe a shock, that his ambitious hopes were more confirmed after this accident than before. If his nephew became imbecile, he could put him aside, and assume at once the title. I do not believe, at that time, that he had any intention of shedding his blood. The long indisposition of Amadeo left him lame and seemingly childish, for his age, and he spoke rarely, even to his cousin, before witnesses. Now, whether during his sickness some words had escaped from his attendants to arouse his suspicions, or that he had an instinctive fear of his uncle, I cannot say, but a trifling circumstance unveiled the ill-will the Conte bore to his innocent nephew.

“ ‘The boys occupied the same chamber, and as nothing is kept secret in the palazzi of the great, their discourse, on the eve of a great masquerade to be given by the Conte, was overhead by my mother, who you remember, Signora, was nurse to Leoni.

“ ‘What character do you mean to take?’ asked the Duca.

“ ‘I have not made up my mind; I want to surprise everybody.’

“ ‘Suppose you play the Duca Manfredonia tomorrow night.’

“ ‘That would just do,—I shall then advance with a majestic air towards the company, and bid them welcome to my castle of Manfredonia.’

“ ‘You would like, then, to be Duca, always?’

“ ‘No, only for one night. Well, it is settled then, that you are to be Leoni; and I, Amadeo.’

“ ‘You forget that I am lame.’

“ ‘We will both limp,—both wear the same kind of dress and mask; and as we are the same height, the trick will pass off well. There will be two Ducas, and nobody will guess which is the right one.’

“ ‘Now, though this was said by Leoni Manfredonia in the innocence of his heart, his cousin suddenly became silent, and, after a long pause, said—

“ ‘There can be only one Duca of Manfredonia at a time. I wish you were that one, only then you must be a poor lame feeble boy, that nobody loves or cares for.’

“ ‘Do I not love and care for thee, Carissimo?’

“ ‘Your father does not—he wishes me dead, I know; but you, Leoni, are kind, and once saved my life.’

“ ‘I won’t play the Duca, then. What ails thee, my Amadeo? thou art full of gloomy fancies. It was you who first proposed the character, and I thought you were in earnest, Duca.’

“ ‘And so I am, Leoni. We will play the Duca together, but I hope your father will not be angry.’

“ ‘Angry with me! oh, no, that would be strange. He loves me as his life; he never brought me home a step-mother.’

“ ‘We are both motherless; but you are happier than I am, for I remember mine and all her love.’

“ ‘My nurse has been a mother to me, I have known no other; and Lorenzo and Marco are like brothers to me; but thou art none,—thou art more my friend; and am I not mother and father and all and every thing to thee, Manfredonia?’

“ ‘Yes, yes, Leoni.’

“ ‘The Duca’s voice faltered, and my mother heard him sob and weep. She related this discourse at home, and much we praised our noble foster brother. It was quite evident to us all that the young Duca feared his uncle. His stupidity was feigned to blind his guardian’s eyes.

“ ‘The day of the masquerade was a proud one to Count Bernardo Manfredonia, who welcomed his guests with as much ceremony as if the castle were his own, and its lawful master indeed sleeping with his fathers.

“ ‘As my mother waited on the company, and Lorenzo and I wore the Conte’s liveries, we had the sight for nothing, and a brave one it was. It was as good as a buffo to see the bearing of Leoni Manfredonia as he advanced to receive the visitors, in his assumed character. The Conte’s brow darkened, but only for a moment. The boy spoke in his own clear joyous voice, and the stern father knew its tones, and gazed on him till his eyes filled with tears of tenderness and pride, and no wonder, for Leoni behaved like a young prince; and when he did unmask, and was recognized by many of the company, there arose a general murmur of regret that he was not the person whose honours he had assumed. As if ashamed of receiving these flattering compliments, the youth suddenly withdrew himself from that gay scene, nor would he re-enter the saloon till accompanied by the Duca, whom he led forward and presented by name to the most distinguished guests. Amadeo was timid and retiring by nature, and he did not shine by his cousin's side, nor did Leoni appear less amiable when stripped of his imaginary title. Some, doubtless, accused him of sinister motives, and fancied this trick was a contrivance between him and his father.

“ ‘ Nothing, indeed, could have injured his cousin's interests more than the part he had played ; yet it was done in singleness of heart, with no other view than amusement. The Conte was delighted, and vowed, in his own mind, to make his son heir of the titles and territories of Manfredonia, by fraud or force, without delay.

“ ‘ He spoke of his nephew with pity, lamenting his deficiency of understanding in pathetic terms ; and so well was he seconded by some of his great connexions at court, that several eminent persons came to Manfredonia, to examine into the reputed lunacy of its young lord. As the object of their visit was kept secret from the menials, I should never have guessed it, if my foster-brother had not disclosed it to me, himself.

“ ‘He had been hunting, some leagues off, with his father, and returned fatigued and evidently out of spirits. Trouble was written on his open brow, in lines too legible to be concealed. I hastened to meet him, but he took no notice of me. I had never seen him so disturbed before. After some minutes passed in silence, I ventured to remind him that his usual hour for dressing had already passed. He started, and motioned me to follow him to his apartment.

“ ‘Marco Monti, I think, nay, I am certain that I can trust you,’ said he, as he threw himself into a seat. I assured him of my fidelity. ‘I place, this day, the honour of the house of Manfredonia in your keeping; but we have been nurtured at the same breast—I feel that you will not betray me.’ There was a pause,—the noble young heart shrank from disclosing a parent’s meditated crime. He at length, said, but with effort,—‘Marco, my father means to defraud my cousin of his dukedom. These expected guests are sent expressly from the Neapolitan court, to ascertain if Amadeo be indeed as he has been reported by my uncle; and he,—yes, my father, wishes me to become a party in this iniquitous design.’

A
y
a l f l o
-
f
a l e s h y
s o
-
t,
s

“ ‘I looked at my young lord, but he had covered his face with his hands, I saw his father’s conduct had cut him to the heart.

“ ‘Marco, among these prejudiced judges, is the Cardinal Ossuna, a good man, who will not sanction an oppressive measure against an orphan. I fear my cousin’s timidity may give some countenance to the charge preferred against him. I would warn him, but how can I tell him that my father is about to rob him of his heritage? Spare my shame, Monti, and make this black design known to him, without delay.’ I promised, and was about to obey him, when he motioned me to stay, and drawing a paper from his bosom, said, ‘My faithful Marco, it is my father’s intention that I pronounce a Latin oration, to welcome his eminence, the Cardinal, to Manfredonia. Now, I mean to falter in the very commencement of this task. My cousin must prompt me; in fact, I will manage so that he goes through the whole speech; and, if he seconds my plan, his dukedom is secured to him for life.’

“ ‘I expressed some doubts lest the young Duca’s memory and voice should fail him in this arduous trial.

“ ‘They must not, Monti.—Here is the oration; tell him to get it by heart, and trust in God to bring him through this peril. Marco, bid him remember that He is good, though men are very wicked. Assure him of my love, and tell him that I am too closely watched to talk with him in person. Ah! Marco, my heart foreboded ill when we were no longer suffered to occupy the same apartment. Yet, surely, my father will not touch my cousin's life: I know not why, dear Marco, but I fear.'

" 'There was, indeed, cause enough for Leoni's apprehensions. Conte Bernardo Manfredonia had never been known to change his purpose. His revenge, though slow, was sure. If foiled in his present design, I knew he would not hesitate to take off the innocent object of his hate. I did not express my thoughts to my dear young lord, for his mind was already overburdened. I departed to execute my delicate commission.

" 'To my great surprise, I found the Duca quite aware of his situation and prepared to meet it. That fatal masquerade had more than confirmed his suspicions, he had heard that which was never meant to meet the ear of the nominal lord of the castle.

" 'I have but three friends in this hard world,' said he,—'God, my noble cousin, and yourself. The first is sufficient to destroy the wicked ma-chinations of my uncle. Tell my dear Leoni, that I will follow his wise counsel. I am timid, but One is with me, whose strength can support my weakness. He has appointed me to this trial, and He will enable me to meet it. Bid Leoni pray for me.

“ ‘I perceived by this discourse that the young Duca had shaken off, for ever, childish things. I remembered that the good Padre Stephano had often told us, ‘That adversity was man’s best teacher.’ I now felt little fear for the success of my lord’s plan. Methought the priest himself could not have spoken better.

“ ‘On the morrow, the Conte, the young Duca, and my dear master, met his eminence the Cardinal, and his company, at the foot of the grand staircase. Leoni Manfredonia then put himself into a graceful attitude, and commenced the Latin oration, wherewith he was to welcome his illustrious guest to the castle. After he had pronounced a few sentences, he suddenly faltered, and turned a look of entreaty upon the Duca, who supplied him with the needful word. Leoni again resumed his task, and again stopped short. His eminence, and his illustrious company, were in pain for him; his excellency the Conte was incensed at his tutor, yet felt like a father for the mortification of his son. He prompted him, but Leoni would not understand the hint. He suddenly turned to the guests, saying, with a smile, 'Most illustrious signors, I am, as you perceive, slow of study, this morning, but the Duca Manfredonia is able to repeat the whole oration, and will, doubtless, be proud to bid you welcome to his castle.' Then gayly putting his cousin forward, he retreated a few steps, and assumed an air of deep and earnest attention.

" 'The Duca raised his eyes to the Cardinal's face, and the benign expression of that holy man's features assured him he had found a friend. He pronounced the oration in a low sweet voice. Nor did he once falter, from beginning to end.

" 'He was long, and loudly applauded, and when his eminence paid him a handsome compliment in the same language, the triumph of the virtuous young kinsman was complete. A single lowering look expressed the rage and bitter disappointment of the crafty Conte. No one perceived it but myself, but it told me that his innocent nephew was doomed to be his victim.

" 'It was a proud day for Leoni Manfredonia; his generous spirit rejoiced in the success of his stratagem. His integrity was secure, the young Duca safe, and his father saved from the commission of a deadly crime. He did not fear his anger, he knew that every feeling of that stern heart was centred in him. And well, indeed, would it have been for him, if the Conte had loved his son less, and honour more.

“ ‘That night, his eminence the Cardinal held a long conference with his host, and, probably, admonished him respecting his evil misrepresentations of his nephew’s understanding. It was supposed that he intimated some intention of depriving him of the office he had so greatly abused. It was evident to all who were not wilfully blind, that his power would soon be over. However, as his eminence was nearly allied to the house of Manfredonia, he would not openly expose his guilty kinsman.

“ ‘A few days after these events, Leoni Manfredonia, fell dangerously ill, and very little hopes were entertained of his recovery. The grief of his father was terrible, it gave my young lord more pain than his disease. Then, nothing was seen but tears, nothing heard but lamentations in the sumptuous halls of the castle. Leoni, alone, was calm; though young, he was pious. Father Stephano thought him fit for Heaven, and said so before us all. The Duca never quitted him, night nor day, and even the hard heart of the Conte was melted by his nephew's self-devotion to his son. The fever was said to be infectious, but what was that to the friend of Leoni, who loved him as his own soul?

" 'I remember, particularly, the solemn farewell my dear young lord took of every soul within the castle, and how he put the Duca's hand into his agonized father's, saying, in imitation of our blessed Lord,—' Behold thy son.' And I really believe that if Leoni Manfredonia had died, his ambitious parent would have transferred his vehement affections to his nephew. In that case, Amadeo would have become dear to him, as the last male heir of the ancient house of Manfredonia. He certainly embraced the Duca with tears, and this, surely, was no hour for dissimulation.

" 'Our young lord was so much comforted by his father's kind behaviour, that he seemed to revive from that moment. Youth and a fine constitution prevailed, and the amicable terms that appeared to exist between the Conte and his ward, accelerated his recovery.

" 'As the physicians recommended change of air and scene for Signor Leoni, the Conte determined to take him to the carnival at Venice. The young Duca was very unwilling to accompany his uncle ;

he was not fond of the water, but his affection for his cousin prevailed, in this instance, over his fear.

“ ‘To Venice, then, we went, Signora; and a splendid place it is, with its palaces and towers rising from the waters, like a crown. The marriage of the Doge with the sea, is a gorgeous sight, when that noble prince claims for his bride the blue circling waves, from which the city draws her wealth, her glory, and her political power.*

* This singular ceremony has been entirely discontinued since the constitution of Venice was revolutionized by the French Republic, at the close of the last century. The origin of the espousal of the Adriatic, with a ring, by the Doge, has been preserved in Heywood's Hierachy. The Duke or Doge of Venice, at the feast of Christ's Ascension, cometh in the Bucentaur, to a place without the two Apostle Gates, situate at the entrance of the gulf, and casteth a rich ring into the sea, as a symbol of the rule and domination, and an earnest of the contract that the senate of Venice makes with the ocean. The first beginning of this ceremony came from Pope Alexander the Third, whom Otho, the son of the emperor, Frederic Barbarossa, made fly from Rome, and forced him to shelter himself at the Convent of St. Charity, at Venice, where he lived, secretly and unknown, for some time. At last, the Venetians, discovering that the head of their Church had taken refuge among them, went in great state to his retreat, and brought him out with great honour. He found that the fleets and armies of the Republic were then departing for the purpose of engaging Otho, and in a great naval conflict which succeeded, the arms of Venice were triumphant, and Otho was brought in, a prisoner, and presented as a vassal to the Pope. Whereupon Alexander took a rich ring from his finger, and presented it to the victorious Doge, Sebastian Ziausus, with these words :—

“ ‘These gay scenes did not seem to give my young lord much pleasure, and the retiring character of the Duca found nothing congenial in the carnival. The Conte alone seemed to enjoy himself, the admiration his son always excited, was a perpetual feast to his proud heart. On every side he had heard it regretted that the handsome high-spirited Leoni was not destined to wear the ducal coronet of Manfredonia; these regrets found an answering chord in his own bosom, and the friendly feeling that the amiable conduct and generous self-devotion of Amadeo had lately kindled in his breast, faded away for ever. Hatred and jealousy sprang up in its place.

“ ‘As soon as the carnival was over, we embarked for Manfredonia, but our passage was very stormy.

“ ‘By virtue of my authority, while thou keepest this ring, thou shalt be lord and husband of the Sea; and annually, thou and thy successors, on this day, wherein thou hast obtained so glorious a victory for the Church, shalt espouse the sea with a ring, that all men may know that the dominion of the ocean is granted to thee.”

The young Duca suffered much from sea-sickness, and we were all in danger of losing our lives. In that hour of peril, Signor Amadeo vowed he would never venture himself upon the waves again; and well would it have been for the timid youth, if he had kept his word.

“ ‘We landed at last, and dearly welcome seemed the friendly shore, after our late danger. Signor Leoni’s health was completely restored, and everybody was happy but the Conte. His hatred to his innocent nephew daily gathered strength, but he carefully concealed it from his son; and the affectionate manner he adopted, whenever he spoke to Amadeo, effectually blinded both the kinsmen.

“ ‘Amadeo was of a most kind and forgiving temper, he believed his uncle’s professions of attachment, and returned his caresses with all the warmth of a young and guileless heart.

“ ‘About this time he became heir to a fine estate in Sardinia, for his mother was a native of that country. Isolar Rosa was the name of this new domain, and the Conte insisted that he should visit it immediately.

“ ‘Now, the youth dreaded the voyage exceedingly; his late peril, and natural dread of the water, recurred to his mind, and he protested against the measure with a vehemence quite out of keeping with his usual mildness. The displeasure and scornful pity of his uncle, and the raillery of his cousin, made him ashamed of his fears, and he yielded, at length, a reluctant consent. The felucca that my father commanded was fitted up with state cabins, and speedy preparations were made for the reception of her noble passengers.

“ ‘Leoni Manfredonia, who intended to be of the party, was much disappointed when the Conte announced his intention of leaving him at the castle, to study with Father Stefano; he loved the sea as much as his cousin dreaded it, and its dangers had no terrors for him.

“ ‘The Duca was astonished and hurt at his uncle’s determination. He loved his cousin, as indeed, he had good reason; and he positively refused to go on board, unless his friend and protector shared the voyage.

“ ‘Leoni added his remonstrances and entreaties to his cousin’s, and their united arguments induced the Conte to yield up the point, secretly resolving in his own mind to circumvent his son and nephew, by leaving the former in the lurch.

“ ‘I was very ill at home, while these preparations were making, and had left the castle for my mother’s dwelling; for there is no nurse like a mother, and, under her fostering care, I rapidly recovered my health; and as the prospect of the sea voyage was as pleasant to me as to my young lord, I was interested in everything respecting the Santa Anna and her outfit. Two days before the one named for her departure, I went on board, to see that my master's luggage was properly stowed, and was much surprised to see no trunks, and only one bed in each cabin, till assured by the mate that the young kinsmen were to sleep together.

“ ‘Not a soul was in our cottage when I returned; and, being tired, I threw myself down on a heap of ropes and fishing nets, and drawing an old boat cloak over me was soon fast asleep.

“ ‘The sound of voices disturbed my nap. The speakers were my father and the Conte.

“ ‘That pale-faced boy stands between my son and his better fortunes,—Monti,—he must die.

“ ‘The opportunity is good,’ returned my sire, ‘but how shall we contrive to get the Duca on board without my young lord to bear him company?’

“ ‘Leave that to me,’ continued the Conte. ‘The felucca sails to-night at twelve. My son will be asleep, and I will tell my nephew that he and Marco are already on board, waiting to receive him. If we succeed in cutting off this superfluous scion of the house of Manfredonia, I will be more than grateful,—I will be munificent.’

“ ‘When such hard work is to be done, methinks something should be given in earnest,’ said my father roughly.

“ ‘Will that content thee for the present?’ cried the Conte, giving my father a purse; ‘and when the deed is done, the felucca is thine own,—Why, I thought thy love to my son would have made thee serve him for nothing.’

“ ‘The entrance of my mother put a stop to this discourse. The Conte left the cottage, followed by my father.

“ ‘I dared not venture to raise my head, lest my father should hear, from my mother, that I had been in the house during his excellency’s visit.

“ ‘Some precious time was thus inevitably lost, and, to say truth, horror and anxiety of mind had so bewildered me, that I knew not, at first, what course to take. I resolved at length, to go to my young lord, and to make him acquainted with the wickedness intended by our parents.

“ ‘I obtained an interview without difficulty; but what a tale had I to tell him!—scarcely could I find words to relate his and my father’s shame.

“ ‘I will go to my cousin, I will warn him of this treachery,—but whom shall I accuse?—my father! Oh, Marco, think of some expedient, or I shall go mad. These dreadful tidings crush me quite.'

" 'That noble spirit did, indeed, writhe in anguish before a parent's premeditated guilt. How could this deed be prevented, and the Conte's honour safe? I suggested the possibility of his being concealed on board with me before the appointed hour. He eagerly caught at the proposal.

" 'Yes, it will do: my father will not hurt him, while I am by. He shall neither eat nor drink anything, unless I taste it first; I will not lose sight of him by day, and he shall sleep in my arms at night.'

" 'Would it not be safer to give the Duca some warning of his danger,' said I; 'he might refuse to undertake the voyage.'

" 'Alas! my father would not stay for his consent, and then my cousin is sensitive and timid. His courage is of that kind which suffers and endures, but not that dares and overcomes a danger. He would die with terror, were he to know his uncle's evil practices. In Sardinia, he has powerful friends, with whom he would be safe. Isolar Rosa is a securer dwelling than his own castle of Manfredonia. He is nearly allied to the Duke of Savoy, and must appeal to him, in case my father should prosecute his cruel purposes against him.'

" 'I remarked 'that his Excellency, the Count, was never known to give up a design, or change an intention. In Manfredonia, its young lord was far from safe. No vassals would either arm in his defence, or refuse to obey his guardian's orders.' I added, 'you have stolen the hearts of all the people, Signor Leoni, and in slaying your cousin, they will think to do you service. The Duca is too reserved and silent to be popular.'

" 'Oh ! that I were hated rather than loved, since my popularity does my sweet cousin wrong. I tell thee, Monti, I can endure the thought of death as of a bitter cup we all must drink ; but the idea of dishonour is too dreadful for my mind to meet. My father's love is worse to me than hatred, since, to raise me higher, he would not hesitate to shed innocent blood.' The noble youth shed a flood of bitter tears. He loved his father dearly, nor his cousin less ; yet his integrity was dearer still. 'Go, Monte, and prepare for our voyage,' continued he ; my foster-brother, Lorenzo's sea-boy's dress, will suit me well. I will retire early, and be on board with thee while my father believes me sleeping.'

" 'I easily prevailed upon Lorenzo to let our young lord take his place, charging him to keep the matter secret. He, who loved not my father's sharp dealing with him, eagerly embraced this opportunity of enjoying his liberty on shore. He moreover offered to go up to the castle, and change apparel with him in person. Lorenzo was idle and frolicsome, but shrewd and bold beyond his years. To him, this project only appeared a joke; yet he was determined to use all his wits to enable his noble foster-brother to outwit the Conte.

“ ‘I contrived to secrete myself on board the Santa Anna that evening; and so well did our plan succeed, that, by night-fall, I was joined by the counterfeit Lorenzo. About half-past one in the morning, the Count and his devoted nephew arrived. From their discourse it should seem that the Duca expected to find his cousin on deck. The Conte informed him that the master assured him that his son was sound asleep in his cabin, and entreated him not to disturb his repose.

“ ‘The young lord of Manfredonia had been roused from sleep by his uncle, who had told him ‘that the wind was fair for the voyage, and that his son was off already.’ Like a lamb, unconscious of the coming slaughter, the devoted youth had obeyed.

“ ‘He betrayed no surprise at the appearance of his cousin on deck a few minutes after the Santa Anna had set sail for Sardinia. The Conte started and turned deadly pale; for the first time in his life he looked sternly at his generous son. Leoni steadily regarded his father, and as the brilliant moon shone full upon their countenances, I saw that guilty man's eyes sink abashed beneath the unwonted scrutiny. Leoni then beckoned him aside: they went into the cabin, when it should seem that my young lord threw himself at his feet, and intreated him to give up his base design. Finding that his parent remained inexorably silent, he declared his intention of partaking of every thing his cousin tasted, and of never losing sight of him for a single moment. They parted in displeasure, and when Leoni retired with his kinsman, his countenance was dejected, his air abstracted, and I never saw him smile again.

“ ‘The Santa Anna proceeded with her voyage, and, through the vigilance of Leoni Manfredonia, the dark purpose of the Conte yet lacked opportunity. A sort of gloom pervaded the crew, the Conte was sullen and displeased, courteous in the extreme to his nephew, but cold and distant to his son. The Duca was oppressed with seasickness, and this disagreeable malady prevented him from being alive to anything but his own sufferings.

“ ‘Leoni was feverish, and harassed alike in mind and body. He occupied the same bed with his cousin, but he dared not sleep. There was no bolt on the door of the cabin, and as it opened outwardly, no means of defence remained to its inhabitants. This he had remarked, and with his faithful arms wrapped about his doomed comrade, watched the weary hours away.

“ ‘The consequences of these vigils appeared in his heavy eyes and colourless cheek. The Conte guessed the cause, and determined to bring the tragedy to a close. He recommended a glass of lemonade to his nephew, as a specific for the effects of the sea voyage, from which he was still suffering. I brought in the beverage, which was already prepared; but before the Duca could taste it, Leoni snatched the cup, and put it to his own lips. The Conte sprang up and dashed it to the ground.

“ ‘The Duca seemed lost in astonishment; he looked at his uncle, and then at his cousin, as if requiring some explanation of their strange conduct.

“ ‘Thou art grown of late a most uncourteous youth, Leoni,’ said the wily father; ‘remember, thou wilt be sixteen, to-morrow, a manly age. If thou art thirsty, is there not drink enough, without snatching Amadeo’s cup?’

“ ‘Nay, uncle, chide not my beloved cousin; he is most dearly welcome to every thing that Amadeo Manfredonia calls his own. In a few days, I shall number as many years as my Leoni. Would, indeed, that I possessed but half of his fine qualities. Come, cheer thee, friend, thy father is not angry. Thou art strangely altered of late.—Surely, thou art not well.’

“ ‘Leoni strove to smile, but the effort was too much, he threw himself upon his cousin’s neck, and wept. While this extraordinary scene was acting, I trembled from head to foot, for I saw that there had not been but an instant between the young Duca and destruction. I remembered, too, that I had received the cup from the hand of the Conte’s servant. While pondering the matter over in my mind, the Conte bade me go, and I left my dear young lord still weeping in his cousin’s arms.

“ ‘I did not see him again, till I came in to serve at supper,—he still looked very sad.

“ ‘Leoni, forgive me if I have grieved thee,’ said the Conte; ‘be of a better mind, and bury [thy sullen mood in this glass. Come, pledge thy father, my dear boy, whose only fault is too much love for thee.’

“ ‘My dear young lord gave his father a look full of reproachful tenderness, but bowed his head in token of assent. I poured out the wine, and by the Conte's desire, filled the Duca's glass. He merely tasted it, but Leoni drank it off. Soon after, he complained of drowsiness, and retired to rest.

“ ‘While assisting him to undress, he took me on one side, and said in a low voice, ‘Marco, I am strangely drowsy, my very senses seem bewildered, and I blush to tell thee that I fear—I have watched my poor cousin these several nights—but I cannot shake off the inclination I feel for sleep. My father's late attempt convinces me that he will not hesitate to put Amadeo to death, even within my arms. Watch, dear Marco, at the cabin door; and waken me, if you hear the slightest noise.’

“ ‘This was the last discourse my dear young lord ever addressed to me. He knelt down with his cousin, and prayed, as was his wont, for some minutes before he went to bed. I lighted the night-lamp, he bade me good-night. I heard him say to the Duca, ‘Amadeo, do not go to sleep; watch and pray, for I am ill and over wearied.—Good-night, my own sweet cousin.—May the good Lord receive our souls to mercy.’

“ ‘These were solemn words, and, doubtless, the last he ever uttered, for I never heard the sound of that dear voice again. In an hour, I softly opened the door, but the kinsmen were both asleep. I left the door ajar, and soon after, lulled by the foaming of the waves and the soft low breathing of the cousins, fell into a dose. I was awakened by the sound of approaching footsteps, when, remembering my promise, I entered the cabin and drew near the bed. Leoni was sleeping with his arms round the young Duca, whose pale cheek rested against his fevered crimson one. They looked a lovely pair.—I whispered in his ear, ‘Awake, my dear lord, or the Duca will be murdered.’ He opened his eyes, but there was no consciousness in their fixed gaze. I shook him violently, and aroused the sleeper on his bosom. At this anxious moment, I heard the assassins at the door, and, overpowered with terror, crept beneath the bed.

“ ‘Alas ! the object of this dark conspiracy uttered a few feeble murmurs, and then again fell fast asleep.

“ ‘The Conte came stealthily in, followed by his own servant and my father. Alas ! that I should have to tell a parent’s crime, but it was his hands that stifled the innocent victim of an uncle’s insatiable ambition.

“ ‘The murdered youth never felt his death, and, stranger still, the faithful breast that pillowed his head, seemed quite insensible to the momentary struggle.

“ ‘’Tis strange he sleeps so sound,’ remarked my guilty father to his still more guilty lord, as they quitted the chamber of death together.

“ ‘The wine was drugged,’ replied the new Duca Manfredonia, ‘he will not awake till noon.’

“ ‘I was so bewildered, and overcome with horror, that I know not whether sleep or insensibility stole over my faculties; but the morning light brought with it the remembrance of the horrid midnight scene. I crept from my hiding-place, to awake my young lord. I thought, as I softly drew back the drapery of the bed, of the agony the discovery would inflict upon him. He appeared still sleeping,—I spoke to him, I touched him, but there were neither breath nor voice,—he was as lifeless as his murdered cousin.

“ ‘My cries brought the assassins to the cabin. In another moment, the new Duca of Manfredonia stood beside his dead.

“ ‘The wine! the wine was overdrugged,’ cried my father, wringing his hands, ‘and our sweet lord is dead.’

“ ‘I have fallen into the pit that I have digged for my nephew,' groaned the Duca; 'my punishment is just, but it is greater than I can bear.' He threw himself upon the body of his son, with a cry that froze my blood.

" 'The course of the Santa Anta was altered for Manfredonia, and, on the second day, she anchored off the town. Her flag dropped, to intimate that death had visited her since she left the port. The Duca had not spoken since the fatal hour in which he found himself written childless. No one could account for the tragical event, but the assassins and myself, and we never told the tale.

" 'It was beautiful, but sad, to see the last scions of that noble house lie in state, in the great hall of the castle. My young lord looked like an angel sleeping; and happy was it for that noble spirit, that it escaped before it knew the consummation of a parent's guilt. Round the pale brow of the young Duca, the jewelled coronet of his princely line was set. To him, that envied tiara had only proved a crown of thorns; to his successor, it was one of fire.

" 'The Duca saw, with dry eyes, the last of his line and name consigned to the sepulchre of his ancestors; for no tears came to cool his burning brain. He died of frenzy, the following night, and his remains were placed between the victims of his cruel ambition. The fatal share he took in the tragedy, was not suspected by his vassals. The death of my young lord secured his father's memory from reproach.

“ ‘The lands of Manfredonia reverted to the crown; the name and line were no more.

“ ‘The remainder of my sad story, Signora, will seem of little moment, now that the ruin of the princely house I served, has been narrated. God visited my father's treachery; for the first voyage he made in the Santa Anna, the reward of his crime, she was captured by an Algerine rover, and he and all on board were made slaves. Then he felt that his sin had followed him, and often would tell me, who shared his dolorous captivity, that he could not rest, for that ‘that pale-faced boy was ever before his eyes, sleeping or waking, forbidding him to slumber or forget.’

“ ‘He died at last, and I and some other Italians who served on board the galleys, contrived to sieze a boat, in order to escape these horrid shores. Alas! our wild attempt only made us wear more cruel chains. We were wrecked, and fell into the hands of these savage hordes. The persecution I endured, subdued my patience; I forsook, at least in outward seeming, my Lord and my God. You, who have been more faithful, pity and pray for me: I will serve you to the utmost of my power, and should you ever come forth from this house of bondage, remember the poor renegade.'

"I could scarcely speak for weeping, while this sad tale was told. I promised Marco Monti to ransom him, if ever I should be restored to my country; but of that I saw little hope at that time. He undertook to convey my letter to his comrade, who would give it to a slave belonging to a merchant of Bujeya, a city some leagues off, who might be able to forward it to the French Consul at Algiers, through some person going thither.

"I dared not build upon the slender prospect of my deliverance, but kept myself constantly employed in my various duties; and was much in prayer. Slavery itself could not, now, disturb my peace.

"Some days afterwards, I was sitting under my favorite tree, with the baby in my arms, surrounded by the children of the Sheik, singing snatches of French ballads to amuse them, while tears filled my eyes at the recollection of my own far-off land, when a deep sigh from some one near me, occasioned me to look up, and I beheld the steward. My joy was speechless; I could only bathe the hands of the good old man with tears, and bless God, from the very depth of my heart, for the unexpected mercy of this meeting. My venerable friend was as much affected as myself; it was some moments before either of us could speak. He was the first to break silence: he told me that the merchant who had purchased him of the Sheik, was exceedingly kind to him; that poor Fanchette waited upon his wife, and was as comfortable as circumstances would permit; and that he had accompanied his master hither, who had brought his merchandise from Bujeya, a city on the sea-coast, to dispose of it among the mountaineers. He concluded his account of himself, by telling me that he had persuaded his master to purchase me from the Sheik, if that chief could be induced to part with me for a reasonable price.

“A lively hope filled my bosom, at these words; I wiped away my joyful tears, and began to tell my second father all the sorrows I had experienced since our separation, my sickness, my despair, the friendly disposition manifested towards me by the Sheik and his children, and Aladin’s unfortunate regard for me. The love of such a rude, fierce being, seemed, to him, a greater misfortune than any thing that had yet happened to me. He entreated me, by no means to consent to such a union, which would not only make me a slave for life, but consign me to certain misery.

“While we were yet talking, we both received a summons from the Sheik, to appear before the merchant. My master took off my veil, and greatly extolled my beauty;—nay, more, he gave the merchant a list of many perfections I did not possess, and spoke of my docility and obedience, as surpassing all my sex. This flattering description of myself, might have made me vain, if I had not perceived it was only a prelude to asking a great price for me. The merchant was liberal in his offers, and the sight of a hundred pieces of eight, and some bales of goods worth as much more, was fast outweighing, in the Sheik’s eyes, (whose master-passion was avarice,) his promise to his son, when that young barbarian suddenly rushed into the room, flung the merchandise on the ground, threw the gold in the dealer’s face, and seizing me by the arm, claimed me as his own property in so authoritative a manner, that his father yielded up the bargain, and the merchant collecting his goods together in a hurry, departed in a great fright.

“I was much mortified and disappointed, and could not forbear turning on the handsome young Musselman a look of great displeasure.

“‘I shall not lose thee, my jewel, my rose, my pearl,’ cried he, still grasping my hands; ‘no, I will kill thee, sooner than suffer my avaricious father to sell thee to another, who art my promised wife.’ He tried to make me say I was as overjoyed as himself; but, though I dared not own my aversion, I shed a flood of tears. Aladin perceived that these were not tears of joy, he threw me from him with violence, nor did he deign to speak to me again for a week. I began to think his love was turning to hatred; but I did him wrong, he had as great a desire to make me his wife as ever.

“Gulbeyaz took part with her son; even Fatmè, Christian though she was, naturally inclined to her brother. The Sheik was persuaded I should make him the best of all daughters-in-law, and a day was at length fixed for our espousals.

“Small was the help I gave in the culinary operations that preceded the bridal. I sullenly wept while in my bridegroom’s company, and prayed to God, when alone, to avert from me a doom I dreaded worse than death.

“The evening before that appointed for my marriage, the great Marabout, attended by a large train of imauns, a guard of soldiers, and two Europeans, made their appearance in the village. This personage demanded admittance to the Sheik, and made known to him the Dey's commands to give up the captives wrecked in the Genoese Tartane, on his coast, without further delay. The Sheik laughed at the Dey's authority; but relented somewhat when the Marabout, whom the Dey had gained over to his interest by large bribes, and larger promises, assured him that he ought to comply, as his Highness could enforce what he entreated, and two priests of Jesus, who called themselves Redemption Fathers, were with him, who would give a noble ransom for these three captives, especially for the daughter of the French Ambassador.

"In fact, the last letter I addressed to the Consul, had reached him at Algiers. M. Dusault immediately obtained an audience of the Dey, and made him acquainted with the whole circumstances of my capture. The Dey was alarmed, lest my detention should occasion a rupture between him and the French court, and, though too fond of money to pay for our ransom, he granted his letters and safe conduct to the Redemption Fathers, who had already agreed to redeem me and my attendants, at any cost, referring them to the great Marabout, (to whom he sent presents,) as the only person who had sufficient influence to accomplish their undertaking with the head of the wild tribes of the Cabaylos, into whose hands the captives had fallen.

“Although superstitiously inclined to yield to the persuasions of the Marabout, whom he esteemed as a saint, and tempted by the large offers of the Holy Fathers, the disappointment and rage of his son, for once, outweighed every other consideration. The mention made by the Marabout, of my exalted birth, though intended to point out the unsuitableness of a match between me and his son, had a contrary effect upon my master’s mind. He proudly reminded those present, ‘that if I were even a king’s daughter, his son was by no means unworthy of an alliance with me, as he was the heir of a mountain sovereign himself.’

“This determination on the Sheik’s part appeared inflexible, and even if the arguments of the Marabout, and the suggestions of avarice, had left him doubtful, the entrance of Aladin confirmed his resolution.

“The rage of this impetuous young man, when he learned the occasion of the deputation, was unbounded; and if his father had listened to his anger, neither the safe conduct granted by the Dey, nor the protecting presence of the great Marabout, would have defended the Redemption Fathers from the effects of his resentment.

"Although greatly grieved by the failure of their mission, these benevolent ecclesiastics would not leave me in the hands of infidels, without another effort to save me. They demanded to see and converse with me, alleging that they were the bearers of letters and presents to me from the French Consul, which they were charged to deliver into no hands but mine.

"The Sheik, who considered me now as a part of his family, was determined not to lose these gifts by a churlish refusal, so he went to fetch me himself; and, to my utter astonishment, communicated to me the object of the deputation from Algiers.

"The hope of deliverance was so vivid, that it quite overpowered me; I trembled all over, and the Sheik finding I could not walk without his support, rather carried than led me into the presence of the mission. I think, an assembly of persons more opposite in expression and appearance, never met under one roof. The Marabout stood telling his beads, with an air of consummate hypocrisy, casting, from time to time, stealthy looks round him, showing, that the world was busy in his heart, though prayer was on his lips. The ministers of Christ who had devoted themselves to His service, bore the impress of their Divine

Master's peace on their countenances. Like their predecessors, the apostles, they had left all to follow Him. Their employment, in this heathen land, being the redemption of poor Christian captives from slavery in whose behalf all their talents, their eloquence, and their prayers, were devoted. Directly facing the Holy Fathers, stood my affianced bridegroom, leaning on his hunting-spear, and glancing alternately upon them and the Marabout.

"Approaching the Christian priests, I knelt and solicited their blessing and their prayers. They solemnly laid their hands upon my head, and bade me put all my trust in the mercy of the Highest. They delivered to me, then, the polite friendly letter of the Consul, and the handsome present of wearing apparel he had sent me. I recounted to these good men all I had suffered in captivity, and how the Lord had dealt with me in turning the heart of Fatmè, and inclining her to pity me. The benevolent Fathers wept at my recital, and then communicated to me the Sheik's determination to espouse me to his son.

"My buoyant feelings had never calculated upon the possibility of the Sheik's refusing to part with me. In an agony of grief, I threw myself at the feet of the obdurate chief, I wept,—I implored his compassion in the most moving terms. The Redemption Fathers added the most liberal offers to my passionate entreaties. He was moved,—not by my tears, but by the promise of nine hundred pieces of eight, proffered as the price of my liberty. He looked at Aladin, but that young barbarian maintained a sullen silence, poising his spear in his hand, ready to hurl at the first man who should attempt to take me from him.

“The Marabout undertook the office of persuading my affianced husband. He spoke plausibly enough on the value of money and the worthlessness of women, the unhappiness of a divided house and unwilling wife.—Nay, more, he said that the Prophet Mahomet had in a dream revealed his will to him that the female captive of the Sheik should be sent back to her own country, and that Aladin was to wed one of the daughters of the faithful. This lie, which was devoutly believed by the Shiek, was treated with the most unceremonious contempt by Aladin, who menaced the hoary hypocrite with his spear, and laughed scornfully, when he drew back trembling and affrighted from his youthful antagonist.

“Seeing that all my chance of liberty depended upon Aladin, I quitted his father, came to him, and, prostrating myself at his feet, supplicated him to have pity on me. He called me 'his wife, his princess,' and vowed he would kill me rather than part with me. 'Kill me, then, cruel Aladin,' said I; 'shorten my misery, for if you detain me any longer in slavery, I shall die of grief.'

"Overcome by my emotions, I swooned away, Aladin raised me up in his arms, all pale and motionless,—he believed that I was dead. He rent his clothes, he bathed me with his tears, and ran with me to his mother Gulbeyaz's apartment, sending forth the most bitter cries.—Gulbeyaz believed me to be dying, added her voice to her son's; the noise they made brought Fatmè and the whole household to my assistance, and I began to come to myself. I had sufficient command over my feelings, however, to appear still in a profound swoon; and the lamentations of the women brought the Sheik and the deputation to the spot where I lay. That avaricious chief bemoaned the loss of my ransom in terms so ludicrously pathetic, that I could hardly resist smiling.

"Far different were the feelings of his son, he truly loved me, was touched by my grief, and agonized by my deathlike appearance. I felt his tears fall fast upon my hands, I heard him sob as if his heart would break. 'Oh! Alla,' cried he,

‘only restore this maid to life, and I vow to send her back to her own country, and take the daughter of a believer to wife, since our union is displeasing to thee. Yes, I swear it by the black stone of Mecca and the holy tomb of the Prophet.’

“At these words I opened my eyes, feeling certain that even this impetuous young man would never break an oath he deemed so sacred. Aladin took my hand, and pressing it to his lips, his forehead, and his eyes, bade me ‘farewell!’ and rushed from the apartment. I never saw him from that moment, but his generous relinquishment of me has left an indelible impression upon my mind.

“Notwithstanding my ardent desire for liberty, I could not part with the Shiek’s family without some feelings of regret. The children clung weeping round me, and I kissed, a thousand times, the dear little babe that I had tended from its birth. I distributed between Gulbeyaz and Fatmè the chief part of the clothes the Consul had sent me, but nothing could calm the feelings of the latter, she clung round my neck, called me her sister, and entreated me to take her with me as my servant.

“Most willingly would I have permitted her to accompany me, but that was impossible. I left with her the Bible out of which we had been used to read, for Fatmè had profited so well by my instructions that she could make out a chapter without much difficulty, to her great and endless comfort, I hope. I bade this dear friend farewell with sorrow, because I knew that on earth, at least, I should 'behold her face no more.'

"That evening I departed with the holy Fathers who obtained my freedom, and that of the faithful Monti and his renegade companion, for nine hundred pieces of eight. When we arrived at Bujeya, we sought out the house of Mahomet, the merchant, and had the happiness of redeeming the good steward and poor Fanchette.

"Like the children of Israel returning from their captivity, 'we were like those that dream,'—so unexpected—so marvellous—was our deliverance. The joy of my second father was greater on my account than his own; with a loud voice he returned thanks to that Almighty Being who had wrought so mightily in our behalf, especially for my preservation.

"From Bujeya, after having been hospitably entertained by Mahomet, we embarked for Algiers, and on the third day landed at that city. I was instantly conducted to the Consul's house, still wearing, at the request of the good Fathers, the garments of captivity. Monsieur Dusault himself received me at the court of his habitation, which was crowded with Christians, Jews, Armenians, Moors, and even Turks, whom the story of my misfortunes and high rank had attracted there. The Consul took me by the hand, and led me into the chapel, where I prostrated myself before the altar, and publicly returned thanks for my redemption from slavery. Mass was then said, and a Te Deum sung on this felicitous occasion. Mingled tears of joy and sorrow flowed from my eyes; at this moment, thoughts of home were blended with the recollections of the dead. My mother and brother rose before my mental eye: I was about to return to my native country, while they had found a grave in a strange land; but when, as with one voice, the congregation raised the lofty hymn of thanksgiving to the 'Lord God of Sabaoth' for my deliverance, every feeling that partook of the bitterness of this world was lost in unbounded rapture.

"How sweet, in the ears of Christian slaves, sounded the praises of the Almighty! how often had we panted to enter the courts of the Lord's house, and join in the service of our God, with those that kept holyday during our bondage among the heathen!

"Yes, my children, we now bent before His altar in deep gratitude for His great mercies vouchsafed unto us. Even the infidels who entered with us were moved to tears, and said, 'The Lord hath done great things for them.'

"After a few days sojourn in Algiers, we embarked for France, and, after a dangerous passage, arrived at Marseilles in safety. My dear uncle, the Marquis de Varenne, hastened to meet me the instant I landed, having already received letters from the Consul, to apprise him of my coming. My father's family received me as one risen from the dead, having long believed me an inhabitant of a watery grave. My father's official capacity deprived him of the pleasure of seeing me for some years; and when the parent and child met, I was a happy wife and mother, surrounded by kind friends, and blessed with the tenderest of husbands.

"And what became of the faithful steward?" eagerly demanded the young people.

"Jaques lived to give you, Adeline, his patriarchal blessing; he died in my arms, having seen more than a century, deeply lamented by his adopted daughter.

"I have now faithfully narrated to you, my dear grand-children, the misfortunes that clouded the morning of my life. I have fully completed my eighty-third year, and daily expect 'to put off my frail tabernacle,' trusting that He who has never forsaken me in the time of my adversity, who has been with me in all the years of my prosperity, will yet guide me 'when I walk through the valley of the shadow of death.' Equal trials may yet befall you, my beloved descendants; it is requisite, then, for you that you should arm yourself with faith, that, with me, you may be enabled to say, 'weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.' "

THE
WIDOW AND ORPHANS.

The Widow.

Oh! what is death? 'Tis life's last store,
Where vanities are vain no more;
Where all pursuits their goal obtain;
Where life is all retouch'd again;
Where, in their bright results shall rise,
Thoughts, virtues, friendships, loves, and joys.

Gambold.

"THOUGH He slay me, yet will I trust in Him," escaped from the lips of a solitary being, whose form and face, although clothed in the garb of sorrow, supplied abundant evidence that grace and beauty, of no ordinary character, had been possessed by her. "All must be well in His hand," she continued, "who knows the end from the beginning; although I am unable to form an opinion of what may yet await me, or when my present affliction will end."

A gentle moan broke, at this instant, upon the ear of the lovely mourner, and she turned at once to the form whence it issued, with sensitive anxiety. All was again still, but her eye fell upon the form of her beautiful child, who, overcome by the heat of the evening, and unconscious of the wretchedness which the fond mother felt, had laid her little head upon her snow-white arm, which rested on the arm of the chair on which she sat, and had fallen into a sweet sleep.

"My poor, poor Julianna," sighed the parent, "Heaven be thy protector, and the Father of the fatherless thy friend."

All the feelings of the devoted mother rose at the instant, and prevented further utterance. A long deep sigh escaped her, as if the sorrowing existence she possessed was about suddenly to break up. A silent tear stole down her pale cheek, as she elevated her clasped hands and her eyes to heaven, and meekly exclaimed, "Thy will be done!" and then, turning again to her child, she impressed a fond kiss upon her downy cheek, and tears gushed forth freely to the relief of her heart. The warm salute, and the tears which trickled upon Julianna's face, awoke the lovely girl, and seeing her beloved mother bathed in tears, she sprang upon her neck, and exclaimed, in affectionate solicitude, "Oh, my mother, my dear, dear mother ! why is it that you weep so much ? do give over crying," she continued, looking most piteously in her mother's face, and wiping away, as she spoke, with her little handkerchief, the fast falling tears ; "won't father come and see us again, some day ?"

These innocent enquiries pierced the fond mother to the heart, and made her feel, more deeply than before, the comfortless state of widowhood. Still, the mother's tears continued to flow, while the child employed all her little arts to divert her mind from its misery, and relieve it of its sorrow.

"Now, if you won't cry any more," resumed the affectionate innocent, "I'll repeat the lines you taught me and brother Harry, and of which I have heard you say you are so fond."

The prattle of the sweet child continued to add to the fond mother's emotion ; and Julianna, without waiting for her bidding, and with the view of allaying her parent's grief, recited the following stanzas :

THE ABSENT SIRE.

My dear, my loved father, how long he's away !—
 Oh ! where is he gone, and why does he stay ?—
 Has he gone to the field, to seek flowers of spring ?—
 And will he return, and a nosegay bring,

Or some rosy-ripe fruit from the garden ; and then
Stay at home with us here, nor leave us again ?

Oh, no ! oh no, my girl.

Does he know that your heart is breaking with woe,
And that I and my brother are weeping so ?—
How cross and unkind our friends have grown
To you, and to us, since he left us alone ?—
Or how oft we ask bread, and you've none to give ?—
Does he know all this, mother, and yet from us live ?

Oh, no ! oh no, my girl.

And won't he come back, and love me again,
And kiss me, and call me his own, when in pain ?—
Won't he pray by my side, as he used to do,
And teach me to sing, my dear mother, to you ?—
And tell us of heaven, of God, and His Son ;
Of how He has loved us, and what He has done ?

Oh, no ! oh no, my girl.

He will never come back, my dear child, and we Shall no more, in this land, your dear father see ;
He knows not our sorrow, he feels not our woe :
He is living with those who but happiness know,
In the heaven he spoke of, and told you the way,
When kneeling before him, he taught you to pray.

He's there ! he's there, my girl.

As the child concluded the last stanza, the mother's bursting grief almost overpowered her.

She shuddered, and half wildly repeated, "He's there! he's there, my girl!"

For a moment she cast her fine dark-lashed eyes, now swollen with weeping, up to heaven, and meekly breathed a fervent prayer to Him who is a Father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widow, in His holy habitation,—and who has commanded—"Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me."—Jer. xlvix. 2. "Leave me not," she supplicated, "neither forsake me in this my time of desolation." And then, with all the indescribable fondness of a mother's love, she pressed the little orphan to her beating heart, and thus answered her child's last enquiry.

"No, my dear; your father, your dear father will come back no more; he is gone from us for ever!"

"Gone for ever, dear mother!" responded the innocent girl, with undissembled astonishment, not as yet comprehending her parent's meaning, or understanding the loss the family had suffered. "But he will return, one day, dear mother?"

"No! never, never, my child; he is ——" Deep sobs prevented her further utterance, she would have said "dead!" but she could not. Her tears fell fast on the shoulder of her child,— a pause ensued. It was but a brief pause of only a few moments duration, but it was an awful one. Anguish seemed to have poured itself out in a torrent, filling with unmingled asperity, her agonized bosom, and threatening immediate destruction.

Juliana perceived the fearful alteration her mother's countenance had suddenly undergone; the fixed rigidity of her late placid features, and the vacant gaze of her once bright eye; and she felt alarmed.

"Oh, mother, mother!" cried the child, "speak to me; are you not well?"

Suddenly the parlour-door flew open, and in bounded the laughing Harry, shouting, with unrestrained mirth, as he entered: "Only look, mother, what a pretty bird our Tiney has caught;" and, as he said so, he held out to his poor mother the little fluttering captive, which he had rescued from the tiger-like claws of the cat. "I'll buy a cage for it, and—"

This hasty-formed purpose and joyous prattle suddenly broke off, as his eye caught the tears that flowed down his mother's face, and which, until that moment, he had not perceived. The affectionate boy stopped short, gazed a moment, and then rushing fondly towards her, in a soft, subdued tone, enquired, as his sister had before done, "Are you not well, dear mother?"

"Ye-- yes, my dear boy," answered Mrs. Somerville, as she roused herself from her stupor, and bent over her child to kiss his dimpled cheeks. "Yes, Henry, I am well;—at least I am better, much better than I was."

This was indeed the case; nature had partly relieved herself by the tears which the fair mourner had shed, while the unexpected appearance of Harry had for a moment directed her mind to other subjects, than those which had before entirely possessed it.

The minds of children are soon and easily affected: smiles and tears are often seen, as if striving for the mastery in their countenances. The most trifling circumstance frequently either depresses or elates them. They think not deeply, and hence they feel not acutely. The past and the future are, in their happy experience, swallowed up in the present. Thus it was on the present occasion. Julianna felt happy to see her mother smile again,—although the smile which played upon her features was a faint one, and seemed to partake more of sorrow than of joy;—and sharing with her brother in the delight which the possession of a bird had produced, she looked upon it with tearful pleasure.

"Don't hold it so tight, Harry," cautioned the thoughtful girl; "I am afraid you will hurt it; I will run and fetch the cage which our dear father's canary-bird died in. I know where it was put, after poor Charley was buried."

Harry, in the fullness of his delight, had forgotten this, or doubtless he would have procured it himself, before now. "Yes, do, Juli." cried the enraptured boy; "run, make haste."

The last words he uttered were not heard by his sister, for she ran, like a little fairy, up to the lumber-room, where the cage was, and in a few seconds returned with the poor bird's intended prison-house to the parlour.

"There," said Harry, as he caged the fluttering thing; "now you can sing to us."

"My dear," said Mrs. Somerville, as the affrighted creature flew wildly round the bars of its confinement, seeking, in vain, some friendly place of escape; "your bird will never sing; it is, I perceive, a poor Robin."

"Not sing, mother?" rejoined Harry, who was leaning on the shoulder of Julianna, gazing with transport on his prize; "why won't it sing?"

he enquired, with evident astonishment; "don't Robins ever sing?"

"In their wild and unconfined state, my dear," returned Mrs. Somerville, "they have some beautiful notes. Some, indeed, have been known to sing in cages, but then they had been taken while very young."

"Well, dear mother," hastily interrupted Harry, "this is only a young one, and——"

"Be patient, my dear boy," observed his mother, "and I will explain to you: those to which I have referred, were much younger than this."

"But won't it look pretty in the cage?" asked Harry, "although it won't sing."

"Would it then afford pleasure to my Harry," rejoined Mrs. Somerville, "to witness the unhappiness of another creature?"

"I should not like to see any body unhappy," replied the artless boy; "but if I feed poor Bob well, he cannot be unhappy,—can he, mother?"

"Yes, my dear," replied his parent, "he can and will be unhappy;—he would still want liberty. The love of liberty is natural to all inferior creatures, as well as to man; and however well you may provide for this poor bird, such provision would not be equal to his liberty; the most splendid cage, and the most abundant food, would not form a substitute or compensation for freedom. Besides, Harry, continued the kind teacher, "should you retain him, you will find he will not eat; he will pine away and die."

"Will he, indeed, mother?" asked Julianna, whose eyes had been fixed upon the lips of her parent, while her ears had listened to the sounds they sent forth. "Then you had better let it go, Harry," she said turning to her brother, who still held the cage in his hand, gazing upon his trembling and fluttering prisoner.

"So I will," exclaimed Harry, "for I do not like to see any thing unhappy; and when I grow a man, if I have the power, I'll let everybody have liberty, and make them happy too. Poor Bob shall fly abroad again; he shall, dear sister, he shall." So saying, he left the room with as much haste as he had entered it, and apparently with as much pleasure, to perform his promise.

Scarcely had Harry quitted the apartment, and Mrs. Somerville resumed the work she had for a short time laid aside to give vent to her violent grief, while Julianna took her seat by her side, before a loud knocking at the outer door announced some unexpected, and apparently haughty visitor.

"Who can this be?" thought Mrs. Somerville, while a nervous sensation crept over her, which seemed to presage some approaching evil.

A few seconds only passed, when a person of gentlemanly appearance was introduced, who, after a short, and not very interesting preface, acquainted the mourning widow that he was a professional,—of the law,—and had been instructed by Sir Manwarring Somerville to inform her that the premises she now occupied would be wanted immediately, and that, therefore, at the expiration of one month from the present day, she must positively vacate them.

“As thy day is, so shall thy strength be,” is the promise of unchangeable truth; and in no case has the promise failed in the experience of those who have believed in the faithfulness of Him who hath promised; and the correctness of it was now experienced by Mrs. Somerville.

With a degree of composure far beyond what she had enjoyed since the tidings of her beloved husband's death had reached her, she now listened to the cruel purpose of her hard-hearted father-in-law. She saw, in this moment of trial, an invisible arm outstretched for her defence and support, and relying upon it, she silently said to herself:

Good when He gives, supremely good,
 Nor less when He denies ;
 E'en crosses from His sovereign hand .
 Are blessings in disguise.

His purposes will ripen fast,
 Unfolding every hour :
 The bud may have a bitter taste
 But sweet will be the flower.

Be silent, then, each murmuring thought,
 Base, doubting cares, away ;
 Him whom I trust, has wonders wrought,
 And on His aid I'll stay.

With sweetness and grace, such as at once astonished and charmed the legal adviser, and who, it is probable, had seldom, if ever, before, felt the greatness of soul, and the power of piety, which is breathed forth from the lips of female weakness, when supported by the power of Divine grace, and standing firm in conscious innocence, she assured him, that great as the inconvenience would be to herself and family, the commands of Sir Manwarring should be attended to.

Mr. St. Belmont looked his surprise at the widow, and after expressing his sorrow and regret at her circumstances, with a measure of sincerity which did not always characterise him, bowed and retired.

Perhaps no situation that can be known by a young female of respectable habits and delicate constitution, is more distressing, lonely, or painful, than that of widowhood. Alone, unprotected, and too generally unpitied, she is the jest of heartless wittings, and the scorn or derision of empty flirting hunters after admiration of her own sex. The hand of injustice is often reached forth to oppress her, and the monsters of cruelty rob her of her rights.

To a considerable extent, this was the situation in which the unfortunate Mrs. Somerville was placed. The only child of a respectable family, more famed, however, for genuine piety than for wealth, she had enjoyed the advantages of a superior education, accompanied with the incalculable disadvantage of being totally unacquainted with almost every thing connected with domestic management. Her mistaken parents had followed, too closely, the example of those around her in easy or affluent circumstances, who imagined that attention to mere household affairs would be a reflection upon good breeding and genteel life, than which, no conception was ever more at variance with truth. Her chief accomplishments, therefore, consisted in such acquirements as made her fit to live rather in an ideal, than a real, world. After-experience taught her how great the error was under which her parents had laboured, while the hand of affection and worth removed her ignorance, and taught her that which afterwards saved her from the pangs of poverty.

Before Mrs. Somerville had learned properly to value her parents, she lost them. Death robbed her of the only earthly friends to whom she could look for guidance and protection, except an aged aunt on her mother's side. To the care of this amiable relation, at the age of fourteen, she was confided, and at her hands she learned lessons,

Such as in after life she ne'er forgot,
Which cheered her path, and soothed her painful lot.

Mrs. Stanley, the aunt referred to, was the widow of an officer who had served in the Navy, and lived upon a small pension which the Government had awarded her as a compensation for the loss of her husband, who had fallen in battle, while bravely fighting for his country, against the combined fleets of France and Spain.

This lady had retired to her native place, the small but pleasant village of Upton, which stands about a mile out of the Great Roman road leading from London to Dover. Here, secluded from the bustle of the gay and fashionable world, Mrs.

Stanley held daily communion with her Maker, and by prayer and praise enjoyed a growing preparation for heaven, and tasted some of its sweets, before she entered upon the full enjoyment of that world,

Where all is sublimated bliss ;—where joy,
Pure and seraphic, springs from God's high throne,
Filling each dweller in that holy world
With highest happiness, complete and full.

Anxious to secure, as far as possible, the best interests and lasting happiness of her beloved niece, and to discharge the weighty duties devolving upon her, in the most excellent way, she sought, with untiring diligence,

To point to brighter worlds, and lead the way.

The defects in Julianna's education, in reference to the affairs of active life, over which she had often mourned, she strove immediately to remedy ; nor were her attempts vain. Duty, under her mild and discreet government, assumed another form, and required a new name, to explain it ; while the notions which Julianna had acquired of religion were, from the bright example, and under the happy influence of her aunt, changed for its actual enjoyment.

Between two and three years had passed away in this happy retreat, where

Nature at each turn, her lovers meets
In fairy prospects and ambrosial sweets;
Fields, groves, and orchards, fruits, and flowers, and bloom,
Regale the sight, or ravish with perfume.

Time continued to move on with unnoted celebrity, and Miss Julianna Richmond was ripening fast into womanhood, when an unexpected circumstance brought her into the company of the youngest son of Sir Manwarring Somerville.

Few could have gazed upon so fair a person, and so much unassuming gracefulness as Miss Richmond possessed, without acknowledging her power. She was no coquet; no arts were employed by her to win an object. To such practices, fraught with so much evil, and so disgraceful to female character, she needed not to have recourse,—

She was as nature made her; not as art.

The son of the knight beheld the beautiful girl, and at once yielded up his affections to her. A mutual attachment soon was experienced, and modestly confessed. A similarity of views, and oneness of sentiment and taste, characterised the interesting pair. What the poet wrote, they felt :

They to each other were a world ;—
— Each for the other seemed to live ;
And the whole world, beside, to them Seemed nought ;—but still to give Bliss to each other was their whole employ,
And each felt happy in each other's joy.

Frederick had paid his regular visits to Myrtle Cottage, at least twice a week, for several months; and there, in the company of his beloved Julianna and her amiable aunt, for a while forgot the imperious temper of his father, and his dependence upon him, in some degree, for his future prospects in life.

The entire property which Frederick now possessed, was an estate in Sussex, of about two hundred a year, which had been left him by a deceased relation ; but which, at his death, would pass into the hands of his father. Upon this, he was aware, he could live comfortably, but not in affluence ; and had it not reverted to his parent at his death, he would most cheerfully have, at once, united his fate to his affianced bride. But he paused as he thought on the possibility of involving in trouble and want, those who were dear to him as his own existence.

Hope has ever been a flatterer, and by it thousands have been deceived. Frederick felt its influence, and listening to its syren tones, dared to believe, that the period of his own and Julianna's happiness was not far distant, and in such confidence he continued to spend his most felicitous hours at Myrtle Cottage.

The news of this attachment reached the ears of Sir Manwarring, who immediately summoned his son to his presence, and in the most peremptory manner, commanded that all further connexion with the orphan Julianna should be given up, under pain of his lasting displeasure.

The beauty, worth, and character of Julianna; his powerful feelings, and pledge of honour, were alike pleaded in vain: the haughty knight was inexorable;—either his family, or his intended bride, must be given up. The hard choice was given him, and he was required, at once, to decide, and make his election.

To live without Julianna seemed to him impossible. Love had, for him, more powerful charms than prudence, wealth, or family, and was heard above the voice of parental authority. He quitted his father's house, and did so for ever. He flew to the humble cottage of his adored Julianna, he laid before herself and aunt his whole affairs;—

-
-
o
's
-
s rs ed
pnen
a;
re
as ed
as le, os-mis ard ted ew ht
;-

he pl cerity posse woul
that a cha
Ha
by Ju been a influe they ring ever,
It amiab happy which laid th self, w
Mr with M neighb mied th in a li and ju first-bo expired

he pleaded, with her he so much loved, the sincerity of his affection,—the sufficiency they now possessed,—the hopes he had that Providence would crown their union with His blessing, and that the cruel purpose of his father would undergo a change.

Had no corresponding passion been experienced by Julianna, perhaps such arguments would have been employed in vain; but, as it was, had half the influence been employed, it would have succeeded; they were united, and the doors of Sir Manwaring Somerville's mansion were at once, and for ever, closed against his son Frederick.

It was thus that the haughty father afflicted an amiable pair, when he might have rendered them happy; and fixed a stain upon his own character, which nothing afterwards could erase; as well as laid the foundation for years of misery to himself, which death alone could terminate.

Mr. Somerville, immediately upon his marriage with Miss Richmond, retired to his estate in the neighbourhood of Petworth, in Sussex, accompanied thither by the venerable Mrs. Stanley, who, in a little more than twelve months afterwards, and just before Mrs. Somerville gave birth to her first-born, who, after herself, was called Julianna, expired in the full assurance of faith. The gradual decay and triumphant end of her honoured relative, tended greatly to relieve the minds of Mr. and Mrs. Somerville from the pain which such a separation could scarcely fail to produce.

One year passed after the birth of Julianna, and Mrs. Somerville presented her beloved husband with a son, who, to preserve the memory of the kind relative from whom Mr. Somerville had received his property, was named Harry.

‘A man’s life consisteth not in the abundance he possesseth,’ is, like all other statements found in the same record, a verity which experience proves. And by the same rule it may be asserted that happiness is not necessarily dependent on wealth. The property of Mr. Somerville was far from considerable; and, indeed, considering the sphere in which he formerly moved, and the expectations he had formed in reference to riches, as he rose into life, it might be said to have been small; still all that happiness which connubial love cannot fail to impart, and as much as the heart of man can know, in the present imperfect state, was known by himself and his amiable partner. Every passing day seemed to add to the affection they felt for each other, and so to increase or strengthen the felicity already experienced.

The number of their acquaintance was small, but select; and, hence, all unnecessary expenses, such as numerous connexions involve, were not suffered by them; while their engagements consisted chiefly in training up their offspring, and in ministering to the wants of the indigent and afflicted.

Who knows what shall happen on the morrow? or who can say in confidence, 'To-morrow shall be as to-day;' or, 'I shall die in my nest; I shall never be moved.' The tide of human happiness, alas! often changes; and those who have enjoyed the most flattering prospects, and revelled the most in worldly delights, have generally found them uncertain and short lived:—

The morn that ope'd with brightest glow,
 With sunny radiance gleaming,
 Has, ere night came, been dark with woe,
 No twinkling night-star beaming.
 All has been dark and gloom around,
 Where not a ray of light was found;
 The heart with sad despair has sunk,
 Which erst at pleasure's fount had drunk.

The property of Mr. Somerville, from various causes, became considerably lessened; still they murmured not; neither had it the least influence upon the temper of either. They continued to enjoy an earthly paradise in the growing affections of each other. They had learned to act under the spirit of the noble sentiment which Job uttered: 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.'

Six years of almost uninterrupted felicity had passed away, when Mr. Somerville judged it proper, in consequence of the repeated losses which he had sustained, and the determinate hostility maintained by his father towards him, to make some additional effort to secure a provision for his family. The intention was a laudable one; and considering the uncertainty of human life, and the frail tenure upon which his present income was held, it might be almost said to have been imperative upon him that an attempt, at least, should be made to provide a support for them.

In accordance with such views, he determined to speculate, in person, with some property which rigid frugality had laid by out of their annual income: and accordingly after the afflictive scene of parting, betwixt himself and wife and children, had taken place; and which all attempts at describing, would fail to pourtray, he embarked at Portsmouth with a rather valuable cargo, for the distant colony of New South Wales.

After encountering a variety of weathers, and escaping innumerable dangers, he reached the place of his destination, and news was received by his wife of the delightful fact. With gratitude she read the tidings, and blessed the power that had preserved him.

In a few months after, another communication was perused from her dear husband, which detailed his complete success in the object of his voyage, and, at the same time, expressed the most lively hope of, in a short period, rejoining his beloved family.

This was, indeed, a precious medicine to the wounded spirit of Mrs. Somerville. The weeks, days, and hours were now counted by the anxious, loving wife. Daily she taught her lisping infants to lift their hands in prayer to Him

Who rides upon the stormy sky,
And manages the seas.

that the life of their dear father might be preserved.

The ways of God are inscrutable and mysterious, and he renders account of none of his actions to his creatures. The most mighty angel that stands in his presence, and the most insignificant insect he has made, are alike ignorant of his deep purpose, but as he pleases to make them known ; while the reason why he acts as he sometimes does, neither the one nor the other is able to explain. Still we are assured, that even the most dark and fathomless are founded in eternal righteousness ; and that ' what we know not now, we shall know hereafter,' and knowing, shall reverently and fully approve.

Ten months had elapsed since Mr. Somerville left the bosom of his beloved family, and he was now returning with an unclouded prospect of increasing happiness, having with him wealth sufficient to render himself and offspring as secure against want as the insecure things of time can be said to be so ; when the spirit of the storm spread his dark wings over the vessel in which he sailed, threatening it with instant destruction. Impelled by its fury, the ship became unmanageable, it flew before the roaring hurricane, like a feather hurled by a tempest ; and dashing upon a rock, it ' sunk like lead in the mighty waters ;' and out of a crew of thirty men, besides a female and other passengers, the carpenter and second mate alone escaped to tell the dreadful tale.

The overwhelming tidings of this most disastrous event, reached the now forlorn widow, about one month before the cruel message sent by Sir

Manwarring Somerville was received; the property upon which she now lived passing, by virtue of the will referred to, from Mrs. Somerville and his son's children to himself.

At the early age of twenty-four, Mrs. Somerville found herself a widow, with the weighty charge of two small children, one of whom was little more than five years old, and the other a year younger. Her prospects of happiness, in this world, were all completely blasted. To no point could she turn her active thoughts; and, in spite of herself, thought would dwell on

Joys gone by, and never to return, without feeling most sensibly the wretched state of loneliness and dependence to which she was reduced.

Deprived of the husband of her heart.—persecuted by a relentless father-in-law,—and, after settling her affairs, possessing only about eighty pounds; it was now she experienced, in a peculiar degree, the value and reality—the consolations and supports—of religion; while the domestic habits inculcated by her aunt, produced advantages which exceeded all calculation.

The arrangements which the cruel message of Sir Manwarring rendered necessary, were soon made, and with a bleeding heart, as she looked, for the last time, through the apartments, and over the grounds, in which she had enjoyed so much felicity with her beloved Frederick,—she bade a final adieu to the home from which she was expelled by him, who, of all others, should have consoled and protected her; and with her children sought again the humble village of Upton, and engaged a cottage suited to the reverse of her circumstances.

Two years she struggled against the adversity and sorrow which pressed upon her. The little she had possessed had greatly diminished; her shattered constitution and almost broken heart, unfitted her for great exertion, and yet some efforts she was obliged to put forth. Some little needlework which she obtained from the surrounding gentry, and the instruction of a few children, with her own beloved Julianna and Harry, filled up all her time, and engaged all the energies she was able to exercise.

Time rolled on, bringing with it changes of the most important character, but to Mrs. Somerville it brought none that relieved her misery, or advantaged her circumstances. The cloud of sorrow, by which she was surrounded, appear to gather blackness; and as she reflected on the rapid scenes

throu
bewi what excl
tion
SI and
and down chair grief sorro
dear
—for for e ness implo shall
But n of m
Na receiv
rapid Jul child but t was c

through which she had passed, her mind seemed bewildered by the survey she took of them. "Oh! what a change has not a few years effected!" she exclaimed, mournfully: "to what additional affliction am I to look forward!"

She pressed one hand to her throbbing forehead, and with the other drew forth her handkerchief and wiped away the tears of agony which rolled down her pale cheeks; and then, sinking into a chair, unable longer to restrain the almost choking grief under which she laboured, exclaimed in sorrow's deepest tone: "Oh, my own, my dear, dear Frederick! we are indeed separated for ever!—for ever!" She resumed: "oh, no, no! not for ever; forgive the thought, and pity the weakness which induced the expression!" she added, imploringly; "we shall meet again. Yes! we shall meet, and soon,—never to be parted again. But my children, my poor children:—Oh! Father of mercies, befriend and bless them!"

Nature at length yielded to the shock it had received, and she sank gradually, but with fearful rapidity, towards the tomb.

Julianna, the affectionate Julianna, was still a child, being little more than seven years of age, but the thoughtful and active care of riper years was displayed by her. She watched around the bed, and met the frequent wants of her dying mother, with unwearied attention.

The sensitive heart of the sinking widow now felt all her sorrows blended in one, and that was for her children. She mourned the destitute situation in which she felt assured they would soon be placed.

All the feelings of the fond and anxious parent were experienced, while the holy resignation of the Christian was strikingly displayed. The promises which the book of inspiration possessed, bore her above the rude billows of worldly sorrow, which, "breach after breach" had broken upon her.

The children observed the grief which she strove in vain to conceal, and wept most piteously at her bedside. "My poor, poor orphans!" she said, as mournfully she looked upon and pressed them, by turns, to her bosom, "who will comfort you?—Oh, God!" she added, convulsively, "be thou a father to my fatherless children; save them from the paths of error, preserve them from the ways of sin:—to Thy hands, as Thou hast commanded, I now commit them;—they are thine."

Julianna attended the sign of her fainting mother,—for she could only make a sign,—bent down upon her knees, and received her blessing and her parting kiss. Harry followed her example. The children wept with increasing bitterness; their eyes were almost blinded by their tears.

"Thy will be done!" faintly uttered the expiring widow; and then, still holding each child by a hand, she meekly raised her eyes heavenward, for a few seconds, and silently implored its blessings upon them; after which, with an affectionate mournful smile, she gazed ardently upon her children, whispering, "My work is done; into Thy hands I commend my spirit,—protect my orphans." And then—

Calmly resigned her soul to Him who gave it,
And, with a gentle sigh, rose up to heaven,
To join the triumphs of the host redeemed,
Where sorrow is not known, nor pain, nor death.

The Orphans.

O Thou, the helpless orphans' hope,
 To whom alone my eyes look up,
 In each distressing day:
 Father!—for that's the sweetest name
 That e'er those lips were taught to frame,— Instruct this heart to pray.

Low in the dust my parents lie,
 And no attentive ear is nigh,
 But Thine, to mark my woe;
 No hand to wipe away my tears,
 No gentle voice to hush my fears,
 Remains to me below.

Collyer.

“WHAT is an orphan, mother?” had once been asked by Julianna, as her fond parent wept over her brother and herself, sorrowing that such would soon be their character, as she exclaimed “Oh, my poor orphans! who will protect you?”

That question needed not to be any longer asked:—they now saw and felt what it was to be orphans. Their father and their mother were both taken from them; the former lay buried beneath the waves of the ocean, 'till the sea shall yield up the dead which are in it; and all that was mortal of their broken-hearted mother, was stretched on the bed before them.

The still-warm hand of Mrs. Somerville yet retained its gentle grasp of each of her children, as when she breathed on them her last blessing, and committed them to the care of her heavenly parent, just as she bade them farewell for ever.

Nearly an hour had passed, since their mother had breathed her last; and still the orphans were alone in the chamber of death. An agony which appeared to admit of no relief, tore the gentle bosom of Julianna, while the grief which oppressed the heart of the affectionate girl, seemed to possess a stupifying influence over her. Harry, indeed, loved not his mother less than his sister, but he possessed not that shrewdness of mind with which she was favoured. Without fully comprehending what death was, in the first sight he had ever had of it, he conceived only of it as of a sound sleep of a peculiar kind, and feared, for a while, that his sister's convulsive sobs might disturb or awake their mother.

An older child than Harry, now about six years of age, might have mistaken the flight of the immortal spirit for the taking of rest in sleep, so gently had that tempest-tossed spirit passed to its rest, and so placid was the smile which sat upon her grief-worn face, that the rigour of dissolution appeared charmed away. Her countenance had rather improved than suffered by the change, which the separation of the immortal from the mortal part, might have been supposed to have produced.

"Hush!" said Harry, softly placing his little finger on his lip, as he spoke; "don't cry so loud, sister, or you'll disturb mother."

"Oh, no!" returned the half-distracted girl, "I shall never again disturb our dear, dear mother; she will awake no more, Harry. She will cheer us no more by her kind smile; she will never again instruct us by her advice. She is dead, Harry; she is dead!"

"Dead! sister?—dead, Julianna!" exclaimed the astounded boy.

"Oh yes, yes!" sobbed out the weeping child, "she is dead,—and we are orphans!"

A speechless sorrow, which closed up the young mourners' lips, prevented further conversation. They mingled their tears, and blended their griefs; their infant hearts felt an undefined measure of trouble; it was heavy,—even to crushing, yet they knew not distinctly its cause; they felt lonely and desolate, yet did they not properly understand why. The terror of death was not yet experienced by them, the face of their beloved mother had undergone no change, and they could still love her as dearly as ever.

Julianna at length took the hands of her brother in her own, and leading him to the side of the bed from which they had retreated, knelt down beside the body of their departed parent, and strove to repress the agony which she felt, while in artless simplicity she sought support to bear her sorrows from the Father of the fatherless."

How long they might have remained in this posture, is impossible to say, for they had already been a considerable time kneeling together, uniting their prayers and sobs, when a gentle tapping at the door aroused them from their grief.

Julianna arose, and hastened to ascertain who had called. Upon opening the door, the kind voice of an old widow woman, who resided something less than half a mile off, soothingly enquired "Well, my child, how is thy dear mother? I should have called before, but business has detained me at home."

Julianna could only reply with a flood of tears, but taking the offered hand of Mrs. Harlington, she led her to the bed-side, and exclaimed in a tone which pierced the heart of the sympathising old woman, "I have no mother, now!"

"Ah! well-a-day, well-a-day!" cried Mrs. Harlington, "is then the blessed lady gone from all her troubles; but," she added, turning to the still crying children, "don't cry so, dears; your dear mother is happy, now."

"Is she happy?" enquired Harry; "are you quite sure she is happy?"

"Oh, yes," returned the kind-hearted widow, "she is an angel in heaven, and therefore you must not take on so."

All the little art which Mrs. Harlington possessed, she employed to soothe the weeping orphans, and at length she partially succeeded; although, more than once, while exhorting them "not to take on, and cry so," a tear ran down her aged cheeks, and frequent sighs burst from her heart.

The first care of the old visitor was, to remove the children from the chamber of death, which having done, she returned, with a near neighbour, to perform those services for the dead, which propriety rendered necessary.

I have frequently been charmed with the beautiful lines of the poet Gray, in which he has, with an exquisite simplicity, introduced to our notice that amiable virtue, gratitude :

Sweet is the breath of vernal showers,
The bee's collected treasures, sweet ;
Sweet music's melting fall ; but sweeter yet
The still, small voice of gratitude.

Mrs. Harlington evidently felt it, although, in all probability, the poet's illustration had never met her sight. She had been herself left a widow, many years ; and although she once enjoyed even more than a mere competency, yet the reverse was suffered by her at the time when Mrs. Stanley and her niece came to reside at Upton. The kind attentions of Mrs. Somerville, then Miss Richmond, were unceasing towards her ; she not only assisted the widow to the utmost extent which her then slender finances would allow, but, at the same time, employed all her influence to procure assistance for her from others. Nor were her endeavours fruitless. Her recommendation had procured for her the situation of housekeeper in the family of a gentleman of very considerable property, with whom she resided several years, and at his death, received a bequest of thirty pounds a-year for life, with a cottage on the estate, in which to reside. In this cottage she still lived, and enjoyed, in her old age, a comfortable asylum from poverty and want.

Evil tidings are swift-winged,—and whether delight to propagate tales of distress, or sympathy with the unfortunate sufferers, induces the disposition to make it known, is hard to determine; the fact, however, remains the same; and the news of grief and loss, is found to travel much faster than of joy and prosperity. The tidings of Mrs. Somerville's change of circumstances soon became known, and met the ear of the pitying Mrs. Harlington; and instantly upon her return to the village, she hastened to her humble dwelling; and again and again, by her cheerful and pious conversation, soothed and cheered the spirits of the young widow; and by her matured counsel, assisted greatly in the management of her affairs.

During Mrs. Somerville's illness, Mrs. Harlington had been an almost constant visitor, scarcely allowing a day to pass, without making at least two calls. On the morning of the day on which Mrs. Somerville died, she had not called, as she had been wont to do. Something she could not control, had prevented her. The rapid change, therefore, which had taken place in her beloved friend, she had not witnessed; and, hence she felt the great surprise when, as we have seen, she called in the afternoon, and found that the happy spirit had been taken to join the church of the first-born in heaven, where sighing and sorrow are unknown; but where

In blest communion of His love, in praise,
High choral praise, strung to the golden harp,
In union eternal with the throng,
Thousands of thousands, who surround His throne,
And feel His praise their glory and their bliss.

Prompted not only by gratitude for her past obligations to the mother of Harry and Julianna, but actuated by the spirit of pure philanthropy, Mrs. Harlington determined that the orphan children of one so dear to her in life, should share with her, during her stay in this world, the little which she enjoyed. Her gratitude to her late patroness, was now transferred to the Giver of every good, that He had furnished her with a small ability, at least, and with an enlarged heart, to return the kindness she had received from Mrs. Somerville, upon the heads and hearts of her dear offspring.

In accordance with the determination she had formed, Julianna and Harry were immediately removed to her cottage, emphatically called, from the situation it occupied,—“The cottage of the grove," where all that kind attention and affectionate zeal could do, to render the orphans happy, was attended to by the grateful old widow.

The whole management and expenses of Mrs. Somerville's funeral, were readily undertaken by Mrs. Harlington, who, after disposing of those articles of furniture and apparel, which it did not appear desirable, or necessary to preserve for the children, and settling the whole of her affairs, found that a few pounds only remained as the rightful property of the orphans. Small as the sum was, she received it as theirs, and sacredly deposited for their benefit, when her own aid might fail, by her removal to the future state.

The light heart of Harry soon forgot the keenness of his sorrow, beneath the endearments of his adopted mother, whom he now invariably hailed by that familiar and endearing name. The grief he had felt was of a transitory kind,—it had not affected his nature. As yet he knew sorrow more by name, than by positive experience, for

Years had not his pillow planted
 With care;—as yet the gloom
 Of grief came not: for pleasure granted
 To every thing a bloom.

With Julianna, however, it was far otherwise.

The tender and sensitive-hearted girl, mourned in secret the loss which she felt could never be repaid; and frequently, while gazing on a beautiful miniature picture of her mother, which hung round her neck, by a black ribband, and which she constantly carried in her bosom, she would exclaim with mournful enthusiasm, pressing it to her lips,—

O never can my heart forget
 Thy love, or in another Expect those varied rays to meet,
 Which met in thee, my mother.

* * * * *

Thine eye spoke deep intelligence,
 With softest pity blended;
 Thy voice was music's self, and thence Praises and prayer ascended.

But ah! that voice I hear no more,
 Which made my young heart love her;
 That eye of fire which blazed before,
 Is closed for aye, my mother.

Whatever a kind and ingenuous heart could do to supply a mother's place, Mrs. Harlington cheerfully did; and Julianna felt how much, how very much, she was indebted to her, and in every way she could think of, or devise, or that her youthful ability could perform, she strove to furnish evidence of how much her heart knew of gratitude; yet still she could but feel that Mrs. Harlington was not her mother.

It was a happy circumstance for the orphans, that the providence of God had given them in charge to a pious woman; one, who although she had never herself been a mother by nature, was, nevertheless, "a mother in Israel," and therefore, while she evinced her concern to afford them all those accomplishments of a personal and mental character, which she conceived their birth entitled them to; she was desirous, especially, that that adorning, which is least of an external order, or even of an intellectual kind merely, but the adorning of "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible," should be possessed by them.

In this peaceful and happy retreat, far from the follies and snares which abound and reign with so much destructive influence in large cities, the widow, with Julianna and Harry, like the famed and interesting family at Bethany, had spent four years together, and as time continued its onward course, their friendship and love continued to increase. Discord had not once entered the happy circle. Peace was their constant guest, and the blessings of the day, were acknowledged with adoring gratitude every night; when suddenly, and unexpectedly,

Like the baseless fabric of a vision, the scenes of happiness with which they had long been favoured, and the felicity they had enjoyed, passed away,—

Leaving not a wreck behind.

At the close of a day which had been unusually fine, the widow, and her orphans, as she affectionately denominated Julianna and Harry, strolled round the vicinity of the cottage, to a greater extent than usual, led on in their ramble by the beauties of the setting sun, and the lovely scenery which every where met their view. The may-bush, the hawthorn, and the honey-suckle, perfumed the air with their sweets, while the variegated hues of numberless fruit-trees, captivated even the aged widow, and bore back her mind to the days when with the same agility as those who now tripped by her side, she strolled among those very scenes. By a circuitous way, they reached their cottage in the grove, and after a frugal meal, closed the day as others had been closed before. The voice of joy and gladness sounded in that humble dwelling, while the song of gratitude rose like incense upwards, to which angels might have listened with delight as they sung, —

THE CLOSE OF DAY.

The calm of even-tide has come,
Sweet hour of rest, and comfort too ;
Joys pure and sacred crown our home,
Lasting as time, and ever new.

Bring forth the Holy Book of grace,—
Let every heart to praise be strung ;
And, while JEHOVAH'S acts we trace,
Love shall make vocal every tongue.

All hallowed be Thy glorious name,
Father of spirits, Lord of all ;
In every place, and age, the same,
Hear us, while at thy feet we fall.

So let us close each passing day,
And fleetly as the periods roll,
Heaven's light, with purer, brighter ray,
Will shine, and cheer each thankful soul.

“That's well, my dears,” observed the old widow, approvingly, to the orphans; “that's well, I think,”
she added with more than usual spirit and animation, "we shall become singers, yet.—Now my love," she continued, addressing herself to Julianna, "Bring forth the Holy Book of Grace." The Book was brought, and the saintly matron perused with solemn reverence the last chapter in the book of Ecclesiastes, offering, as she went on, some brief occasional observations upon the sacred text to her youthful and attentive auditors, and then, commending herself, and her household, to His care, who, "neither slumbereth nor sleepeth," the happy family retired to rest.

For some time past, Julianna had been in the habit of rising first, and preparing the morning repast, before Mrs. Harlington left her chamber. She had done so on the morning in question. Harry had returned from the little plot of ground behind the cottage, where he had been busy for a couple of hours, with his spade and rake, and was wishing for his breakfast. Awhile he waited with something like patience: but his wants got the better of his philosophy,—his patience was soon exhausted; he turned his eye anxiously towards the clock, which clicked behind the door, and perceiving that nearly half an hour had already passed beyond the usual time of Mrs. Harlington's appearing, he became somewhat restless. Julianna was quite happy, and had almost forgotten the hour. She had taken up a piece of work she was performing, and as she worked, she hummed to herself, the following lines on

MORNING.

Hark! the universal song
Rolls the arch of Heav'n along,
As the first faint blush of day,
Chases night and gloom away.
Gushing from a thousand springs,
Earth her free-will off'ring brings;
All who live in sea and air,
Swell the song, the tribute share.

Join we in the chorus now,
While we at Thy footstool bow—
Maker, kind preserver, friend,
With their sacrifice we blend Hallelujah!—thanks be given
Here, on earth, as 'tis in Heaven;
Pealing anthems thus we raise,
Prelude to eternal praise.

On each morn that greets our eyes,
We will pay our sacrifice,— Noblest of Thy creatures, we Will 'bove others grateful be;
And while nature's praises rise,
Incense perfumed to the skies,

Still our Morning Hymn shall be,
God of Heaven, pour'd forth to Thee.

"Hadn't you better put down your work, Julianna?" inquired Harry, "and call mother to breakfast."

Julianna cast her eye towards the clock, and perceiving it was getting late, arose to do as her brother had suggested, observing as she did so,—
"Our dear mother is, I suppose, fatigued after her last evening's somewhat long walk,—however, I will just let her know what the time is." With a soft tread she ascended the stairs, and gave a gentle knock at the door, but received no answer,—She waited, listened, and knocked again,—and again waited,—still all was silent." "It is strange," she thought to herself—"she is not used to sleep so soundly." Once more she knocked, louder than before, but still, no voice was heard. She called gently, and then more strong; silence still reigned unbroken in the widow's chamber. An alarm which she could not account for, shot through her; with a trembling hand she tried the latch of the door, and half-opening it, looked in.

The curtains were drawn down on one side of the bed, as when she left it three hours before. She approached—drew them aside, and in a moment discovered all that her fears had conceived.—A loud piercing shriek burst from her unconscious lips, and she fell senseless on the floor. The noise occasioned by her fall, reached the listening ear of Harry, who immediately flew to his sister, to enquire the cause of her alarm, when he beheld the pale face of his adopted mother, as she lay a lifeless corpse in the bed; and saw at the same moment his beloved Julianna, laying, as he conceived, dead at his feet.

Scarcely knowing what he did, he sprang down the stairs, and rushed out of the house, and almost breathless entered one at some distance, and could only articulate;—"My sister, my mother;—help, help!"—before he fell, and lost awhile all sense, and consciousness.

The assistance which he had solicited, was promptly afforded, and when those who went entered the chamber, Julianna was just recovering from her swoon. A scene not only past description, but even above conception, immediately followed. Julianna beheld and felt herself motherless a second time. Delirium followed;—wildly she called upon her dear, dear mother, and then for her brother Harry. For two or three weeks, even her life was despaired of, and it was expected that the grave which had but recently closed upon her last earthly friend, would soon receive her into its cold recess. Youth and vigour, however, triumphed over disease and dissolution. He in whose hands are "the issues of life and of death;" commanded, and the half-crushed plant recovered and revived.

In the mean time, the remains of Mrs. Harlington had been conveyed to the silent mansion of the dead, in which solemn procession, where most of the villagers attended, Harry followed as chief mourner, and then hastily returned, to strive to comfort his beloved sister.

The first symptoms which were afforded of the maid's recovery, produced in the mind of her affectionate brother feelings of the most extatic kind; with floods of undissembled tears of joy, and with a thankful heart, he thanked God for her recovery.

Information of the widows's death was at once conveyed to the heir of the estate; and as he had never approved of her possession of the cottage and garden,—although, as he possessed no power of depriving her of them, she retained their occupancy;—he rejoiced that the barrier to his wishes was thus removed, and he instantly desired his steward to take possession of them. Hence the orphans were once again thrown upon the world. Those who had been born amidst plenty, and whose first years enjoyed all the delicate and fond attentions of parents and servants, were now made to feel that—"the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." Julianna and Harry might have adopted the language of the man of Uz, when in the bitterness of his soul he said "He breaketh me with breach upon breach." One wave of sorrow had scarcely passed, before another came, threatening to overwhelm them.

The sudden and unexpected death of Mrs. Harlington had left what little property she had laid by for the benefit of her adopted children, entirely at the disposal of a distant and dissolute relation, as she had died without making a will. With the rapacity of a hungry vulture seizing upon its victim, he availed himself of his legal power, and deprived them at once of every thing they possessed.

One only blow seemed now necessary to complete the orphans' misery, and that was soon experienced. The small sum which remained to them at their mother's death, had been carefully deposited by Mrs. Harlington in the banking-house at Dartford. Two months only passed since her funeral, when a sudden alarm, as to the security of property, took place. The panic became general, and was attended in many instances by fatal consequences. An instant demand of payment at the bankers' hands followed, and the result was, the stoppage of payment, and the failure of the bank altogether.

By this sad circumstance, the last earthly dependence of the helpless orphans was destroyed, and they became houseless and homeless wanderers, realizing, most fully and fatally, the soul-touching lines of Young,—

What numbers, once in fortune's lap high fed,
Solicit the cold hand of charity?
To shock us more, solicit it in vain!

While these tragic scenes were performing, the eye of Omniscience was not closed, nor did His displeasure sleep. The inscrutable providence of God had indeed permitted acts to be performed of the most revolting kind, but He did not approve them. That He could have prevented them, is most certain; but the agency of His creatures would thereby have been so far invaded as to have removed from them the accountability of their nature. But who are we, that we should presume to arraign the ways of Infinite Wisdom? The end always makes plain what the present cannot explain.

The proud and cruel spirit of Sir Manwarring Somerville was noticed, and punished by the avenger of the oppressed, "Because he remembered not to show mercy; as he delighted not in blessing, so it was far from him." Against him the decree went forth in the presence of the Judge of the whole earth,—“Write ye this man childless—a man that shall not prosper in his days.”—Jer. xxii. 30.

In vain might power essay or wealth be employed to alter that what had so long been determined. The sentence was irrevocable, the purpose of the Eternal was fixed. The haughty and the proud felt, but could not evade nor change it.

The heir of Sir Manwarring Somerville's extensive possessions, and the pride and idol of his affections, had chosen the profession of arms. A thirst for glory had induced him to become a soldier, and he bore a commission in the army of his native country. Already had fortune crowned him with success. Once and again he had returned from the scene of mortal conflict, to receive the gratulations of his friends, and the rewards which England is never backward to heap upon the titled or wealthy warrior. Neither were the praises and honours which his valour claimed, the only object which made a return to the land of his birth welcome to him. No, a richer prize than these even caused his youthful heart to leap with exultation, as the lofty cliffs of Albion met his anxious gaze. The hand of one of England's fairest daughters—and the soldier's affianced bride—was ready to be bestowed upon him. The eve of his marriage came, but he was not permitted to wed; suddenly he was called to return to the battle field;—and, in the “pride of his glory” he went forth, calculating on the additional laurels with which he should return crowned, and lead the chosen of his heart to the altar. But his days were numbered; the sins of the father, even in this case, were visited upon his child;—the trumpet which sounded victory to the British arms, proclaimed also the death of Captain Somerville.

The tidings of the afflictive event fell upon the soul of the unfeeling knight, as he listened to it, like ice upon a summer plant. His fondly-cherished hopes of beholding a long line proceeding from his first-born, to grace his family and support his title, were suddenly destroyed, and the prolonging of his name upon earth, appeared a doubtful question.

Only one son now remained to the haughty baronet. A youth of no common promise, on whom it now rested to sustain the honour of his father's house. He had just entered his twentieth year, when, like a beauteous opening flower, at whose root a destroying worm lay concealed,—he drooped—and died! leaving the knight childless.

For awhile, Sir Manwarring was inconsolable:—he thought of his son Frederick's death, and his cruel desertion of his children, and his proud heart smote secretly but sorely. His folly in rejecting the virtuous and exemplary object of his son's choice, because destitute of title and wealth, and his cruelty in closing his heart and his doors for ever against him, and his, now appeared to his excited imagination in monstrous and glaring enormity. But how to make reparation—there was the question. Through the agency of Mr. St. Belmont, his legal adviser, now his only friend, he made secret enquiries after the neglected orphans;—but it was too late;—they were wanderers, no one knew whither, or rather, it was believed that death had removed them from the sorrows and wants by which they had so long been exercised.

The agony of Sir Manwarring's mind, as he received

ble-him.
him,
of str
happi
makin
A secr misery could him.

It a spon over t
A he count snow confi closed and no
of free

The
his ow wound direct
The

ceived this intelligence, became almost insupportable—a retributive providence appeared to follow him. Childless, and without a name to leave behind him, he saw his riches must pass into the hands of strangers, and his honours die with him. The happiness which he might have enjoyed, by making others so, he had ruthlessly put from him. A secret grief prayed upon his constitution, and a misery, which all the wealth which he possessed could neither remove or mitigate, fastened upon him.

It was a cold stormy night, in December, when a sportsman, accompanied by two dogs, wandered over the extensive and wild heaths of Chiselhurst. A heavy fog had enveloped the whole range of country, bringing on premature night. The heavy snow which had already fallen, and which still continued to drive furiously over the common, had closed up all traces of foot-path or carriage-road, and nothing met the eye, but one unbroken sheet of freezing snow.

The sportsman had been led out of his way by his own eager pursuit of a bird which he had wounded; and now felt himself perplexed which direction to take.

The gloom which had for some time obscured his prospect, was, at length, dissipated by the rising of the moon, and looking anxiously round for some beacon to guide his course; he perceived, at a small distance from him, a rude shed, which he believed stood near the main road, and he made towards it. As he approached the crazy building, he imagined he heard the sound of human voices proceeding from it; he halted, and listened for a moment, and soon became convinced that he was not mistaken.

He advanced slowly and softly, with his finger upon the trigger of his piece, in order to protect himself from assault, in case of sudden surprise. Presently he distinguished shivering sobs, mingled with fervent prayer.

Still he advanced cautiously, and assisted by the clear rays of the moon, which shone brilliantly through the frosty atmosphere, and lighted up the fragile building; he looked through an aperture in the side next him, and discovered, with great surprise two youths, a male and a female, nestled together in some dirty straw. His heart was touched with pity for them, and making a slight noise, that he might not, by his too sudden appearance, alarm them, he walked to the door, and soon gained an entrance. No necessity existed that he should enquire if they were in want—he saw they were. The very natural impression instantly took possession of his mind, that they were of the gipsy tribe, (numbers of whom are frequently found in that neighbourhood,) and he asked—

“Where are your parents?”

The girl turned on him a look of mingled astonishment and supplication, and replied, while tears streamed down her interesting face.

“Oh, sir, we have no parents,—have pity on us, and help us.”

There appeared so much ingenuousness in the look and language of the speaker, that all doubt respecting sincerity was abandoned by the sportsman, and unwilling to keep them any longer in the cold, as he had made up his mind to assist them, he desired that they would rise and follow him, and immediately led them to a road-side inn, which now became visible by the clear moonlight.

On entering a small room which was unoccupied, he placed them before a cheerful fire, and ordered the servant who attended to furnish them with something to eat and drink. As the appearance of the sportsman was an ample guarantee for payment, no hesitation was manifested, and the required refreshment was soon brought; and while the girl sought to divide a loaf which had been placed upon the table, with her companion, her benumbed fingers were unable to hold the knife which she employed, and it fell on the floor. She stooped to take it up, and in so doing, a miniature, richly set, fell from her bosom. She strove to return it to its place, unobserved, but in vain; the eye of her benefactor, which had been fixed upon her, caught sight of it; and judging, from her evident confusion, that she had stolen it, he demanded a sight of the valuable trinket. The trembling girl drew it slowly from her bosom, presented it, and burst into tears.

Scarcely had the gentlemen fixed his eyes upon the portrait, when he started with amazement at the resemblance of some well-known face, and instantly enquired, in a commanding tone, how and where she had obtained it; charging her, at the same time, with having, as he felt assured, committed a theft.

The lad, who until this moment, had looked on rather with an expression of alarm, than any other, now changed his appearance; a glow of powerful feeling flushed his youthful cheek; his fine and expressive eyes sparkled with unusual brightness, and in an attitude and tone far above his years, exclaimed, "My sister is not a thief."

"How came you possessed of this?" repeated the gentlemen, holding out the miniature, and still addressing the girl; "to whom did it belong?"

"It was my mother's, sir; my own dear, dear mother's," answered the weeping child.

"Your mother's?" rejoined Mr. St. Belmont, in amazement, for it was Sir Manwarring's friend, "what is your name?"

"Julianna Somerville, sir, and this is my brother Harry," was the reply.

"Merciful Providence!" exclaimed Mr. St. Belmont; and then gazing awhile on the orphans, he recognized the likeness of the parents in the children, and kindly pressing them by turns to eat and be comfortable, he wept over them with sorrow and joy.

That night, they were provided with comfortable beds at the inn, and the next day, after having furnished them with a change of dress, they accompanied him, in a post-chaise, to his own house.

A little enquiry soon put him in possession of the eventful history of their sufferings and wanderings, from the time of Widow Harlington's death, up to the moment in which he providentially met with them in the shed.

His next care was to inform Sir Manwarring, by degrees, of the restoration of his long lost grandchildren. This he did prudently, for age and sorrow had reduced him to a state of almost childish weakness. Julianna and Harry were soon introduced to the apartment where he was seated. The old man recognized the likeness of his son Frederick in the countenance of Harry, instantly as they entered. The orphans approached the knight, who now shed tears of sorrow and of pleasure; he tenderly embraced them, and listened with delight, not unmixed with pain, to their artless tale of sorrow and sufferings. It was a sight such as some master genius would have delighted to witness, in order to have transferred the interesting scene, in living characters, to the canvas.

Preparations were then made to secure the whole of the knight's large possessions to the orphans, after his decease. The instrument was drawn up by Mr. St. Belmont, and signed by Sir Manwarring, in the presence of witnesses. He survived the act but a short time; but sufficient to afford pleasing evidence of sincere regret for his past conduct towards their parents and themselves, and his humble and exclusive dependence upon the merits of the Saviour for forgiveness and for everlasting life.

Julianna and Harry, fully alive to the highest emotions of gratitude, lived to become eminent blessings to the population around them; and practically consecrated themselves, and what they possessed, to Him and His service, whose watchful care and merciful providence had taken care of, and preserved them, even while friendless orphans.

THE END.

EVERY CHILD'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND:

WITH QUESTIONS TO EACH CHAPTER.

Particularly suited for Children, and for Home, or Infant School reading. By MISS CORNER.

1s. sewed; or 1s. 6d. bound in cloth.

GUIDE TO USEFUL KNOWLEDGE:

BY CHARLES BUTLER.

Containing, in the popular form of an easy and familiar Catechism, the newest and most useful information connected with the Arts, Sciences, and the various Phenomena of Nature. For the use of Schools and Families.

Fourth edition, corrected; 1s. 6d. bound in cloth.

GUIDE TO GEOGRAPHY: BY CHARLES BUTLER.

A new, pleasing, and concise description of the Five great divisions of the Globe: the empires, kingdoms, and states, into which they are divided; and the natural, mineral, and vegetable productions of the several countries; with the numbers, and the manners and customs of their inhabitants.

New edition, corrected, 1s. 6d. bound in cloth;—or, with Seven Glyphographic Maps, and the Use of the Globes, 2s. bound.

STORIES OF THE ELEMENTS;

Or, the Old Man and his Four Servants; Volcanoes and Earthquakes the Volcanic Island, and the Indian Family.

By MRS. BAKER. With six pages of engravings printed in tint, 1s. 6d. cloth, lettered, with richly coloured frontispiece; or, 1s. sewed, with plain frontispiece.

SCRIPTURE NATURAL HISTORY; BY THE REV. J.

YOUNG, A. M. Being a pleasing description of the nature and habits of the most interesting and wonderful of the Works of God, as exhibited in Creation, and recorded in Scripture.

With numerous illustrations, and eight pages of elegant engravings; 2s. 6d. handsomely bound in cloth.

ILLUSTRATED JUVENILE KEEPSAKE OF AMUSE-MENT AND INSTRUCTION. With upwards of sixty engravings
1s. sewed,—or 1s. 6d. bound in cloth, lettered.

TALES OF SPRING FLOWERS AND SUMMER BLOSSOMS; FOR THE YOUNG AND GOOD:

About Snow-drops,—the Wall-flower,—and Cowslips and Primroses.
With six pages of elegant engravings, 1s. sewed—or 1s. 6d.
in cloth, lettered, and coloured frontispiece.

MORE TALES OF SPRING FLOWERS AND SUMMER
BLOSSOMS; FOR THE YOUNG AND GOOD:

About Hare Bells,—the Bee Orchis,—White Violets,—Water Lilies,— Wild Roses,—and Wood Anemonies.
With six pages of elegant engravings, 1s. sewed;—or 1s. 6d.
in cloth, lettered, and coloured frontispiece.

THE TWO PARTS, elegantly bound in one handsome volume, gilt edges, with eleven pages of engravings, tinted, 2s. 6d.

THE VILLAGE SCHOOL: WITH THE HISTORY, AND WHAT BECAME OF, SOME OF ITS SCHOLARS.

1s. 6d. cloth, with many engravings, and richly coloured frontispiece; or, 1s. sewed in fancy covers, plain frontispiece.

LITTLE TALES FOR THE NURSERY;

AMUSING AND INSTRUCTIVE.

By the Author of 'Sketches of Little Girls,' 'Little Boys,' &c.
With beautiful illustrations.

1s. 6d. cloth, lettered, and richly coloured frontispiece; or
1s. sewed, with plain frontispiece.

THE WIDOW AND ORPHANS; OR, CHANGES OF LIFE.

BY THE REV. J. YOUNG, M. A. Author of Perils of Paul Percival, Scripture Natural History, &c.

With seven pages of elegant plates, and vignette title, 1s.
sewed; or 1s. 6d. cloth, and richly coloured frontispiece.

LITTLE STORIES ABOUT PRETTY LITTLE BIRDS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF KEEPER'S TRAVELS, &c.

With seven elegant engravings, and vignette title, 1s. sewed;
or, with coloured frontispiece, 1s. 6d. bound in cloth.

THE ORPHAN CAPTIVE; OR, CHRISTIAN ENDURANCE;

a Tale of the Shipwreck and Captivity of an Ambassador's Daughter.
By Miss J. Strickland.

With seven pages of elegant plates, 1s. sewed, or 1s. 6d. cloth.

SCRIPTURE PARABLES, in EASY VERSE, for CHILDREN; WITH AN EXPLANATION OF EACH PARABLE, IN PROSE.

By the Author of Ruth and Naomi,—the Widow's Cruise of Oil,—Isaac and Rebekah, &c. Illustrated with eight pages of beautiful plates, and twenty engravings on wood.

1s. 6d. cloth lettered, and richly coloured frontispiece; or,
1s. sewed in fancy covers, with plain frontispiece.

STORIES OF THE FIVE DIVISIONS OF THE WORLD;

descriptive of the peculiar habits and customs of the Inhabitants of Australia and Polynesia,—Omoko, King of Africa,—the Elephant, and the Little Dog of Siam,—the American Slave Trade,—and Europe or, English Freedom.

With neat vignette illustrations, and six elegant engravings printed in tint. 1s. sewed; or 1s. 6d. bound in cloth.

STORIES OF THE FIVE SENSES; OR, WHICH IS BEST?

An entertaining Little Book, for Little Ladies and Little Gentlemen.

With vignette illustrations, and six elegant tinted engravings, 1s. sewed; or 1s. 6d. bound in cloth.

ENTICK'S NEW SPELLING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE:

In which the Parts of Speech are accurately distinguished,—and to which is prefixed, a Comprehensive English Grammar. The whole revised, corrected, and improved, by John Robinson.

New edition, 2s. 6d. bound in sheep.

SHERIDAN'S PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Revised and improved throughout, by STEPHEN JONES. A new edition, further corrected and improved, with the addition of several hundred words frequently occurring in the Arts and Sciences, and in the works of modern Authors, by WILLIAM BIRKEN.

3s. 6d. strongly bound, and lettered.

HOWARD'S SPELLING AND READING BOOK;

Adapted for Schools and Private Families.

Containing much instructive Reading; the spelling and meaning of upwards of One Thousand words, chiefly such as are used in the Holy Scriptures; Multiplication and other Tables, &c.

Third edition, 1s. bound in leather.

HOWARD'S READING LESSONS FOR HOME AND DAY SCHOOLS. With frontispiece and many neat engravings.

Third edition, 6d. sewed, in stiff covers.

HOWARD'S POETRY LESSONS FOR HOME AND DAY SCHOOLS.

Selected from various Authors, and adapted to different Ages. With neat frontispiece.

6d. sewed, in stiff covers.

1170

✓
K -

