Excitement gets up with the fury of Ate,
And Dry Goods are slaughtered at a terrible rate, One with dolls and tin whistles, and pictures to please Cries "Gifts for the Million," come draw lots for these.
Tho' gambling's a vice, when I preach I denounce; It pays well at Christmas—excuse me for once.
Another has catered the earth, air and seas, Oysters, frogs, a la Francois, or rich Cheshire cheese;
With veal and fat turkeys, decapitate geese, How attractive, indeed, mixed with fine cluny lace.
Little Will gets gum candy, big daddy gets mutten; Pa, if you eat all that, ma will call you a glutton.
A third, quite indignant, cries what a melee, A disgrace to the trade and disgusting to me, But to not be outdone in this mercantile war, I'll, by Jove, steal a march, and take silver at par;
Of the baits thus displayed, so enticing and kind
The public can judge for themselves as they find.
We make no pretence with such side winds to sail, But steer a straight course with the breadth of the gale Be it summer or Christmas, or depth of the winter, The best value for cash is with Tenison & Hunter.

My Unknown Lover.

By a Young Correspondent.

One calm and beautiful evening in summer, I was sitting at my window, looking dreamily out on the blue sky, when I happened to glance on the ground.
I saw a man moving slowly up the walk which led through our flower garden; he paused directly opposite where I was sitting; he was fine-looking and handsome, too, I thought, for I could see his face plainly as he stood in the bright moonlight, gazing up at me. Who could he be, and what did he want there? I felt no fear, but sat looking at him like one in a dream. I was perfectly charmed.
What beautiful eyes he had; they were the most fascinating I had ever seen; there was something like magnetism in them.

He watched me for nearly five minutes without saying a word; then he came closer to the window, and said to me, in a low, musical voice, "You are beautiful —the loveliest thing I ever saw. Why do you live in this seclusion, when you would shine as a bright star in any palace?"

I listened with mingled amazement and pleasure to what he said. I had always been called beautiful by every one; but never before had my heart beat with pleasure at being told how beautiful I was, as it did at that moment. As soon as I could get over the surprise which he had caused, I exclaimed, "Who are you, strange sir?"

"Ask me not, charming lady, who I am, for I cannot tell you. My name must be kept strictly secret. I have enemies who would seek to destroy me if they knew I was here. I mean no harm by being here; there is nothing ignoble in me. I hope you will trust me."

"Trust you? What do you wish me to trust you in?" I asked, in amazement.
"Trust in my sincerity of purpose and nobility. I have a secret to tell you, and I would like to have a private interview with you, if you would be so kind as to grant me that privilege."

I was bewildered. What did he mean?
What kind of secret did that stranger have to tell me? were the thoughts that passed through my mind.

I did not speak then aloud, but remained in silence. He broke the stillness, by saying, "Wonder not at my strange conduct. I have seen you before this evening, and greatly admire you; I have come here expressly to beg an interview with you to-morrow. Will you meet me in the garden after twilight?"

"Yes, I will," I answered, hardly knowing what I said.

"Keep our meeting a profound secret from all. Farewell, my beautiful queen," he said; and kissing his hand gallantly to me, walked away.

I wondered at myself greatly for promising to meet a stranger alone; but I took an interest in him from the moment he spoke. I was in love with him at first sight.

My dreams that night were of the mysterious stranger; and pleasant ones they were. I thought he was a prince, and had come in that disguise to make sure that I loved him. I was very happy all the next day; but, nevertheless, I was restless and impatient for the twilight hour to come.

The weary day was at length ended, and the moon's soft light shone into my chamber through the window at which I was sitting, watching with eager eye and throbbing heart for my unknown admirer to make his appearance. The tiny clock on the mantel-piece chimed the hour of eight before he came. I had almost given up the idea of his coming, and felt convinced that it was all a dream or a wild delusion. Just as I arrived at that conclusion, I saw his stately figure moving up the garden walk. I hastily threw a thin shawl over my shoulders, and went to meet him at the place he had designated. When I entered the garden, he was passing up and down the walk with impatient step.

When he saw me he came quickly forward to meet me, and taking my hand in his, he said, "I thank you for giving me this opportunity of having an interview with you."

I trembled like an aspen leaf, for I knew I was not doing a prudent thing to meet a strange gentleman alone at night; but yet could not withstand his pleading looks and words, to hear all he had to say to me. He noticed my agitation, and said, "Do not fear me, fair lady. I would not harm you for worlds."

He then led me to the little vine-clad arbour, and requested me to sit down, which I did; he took a seat by my side, still retaining my hand, and commenced a conversation in this manner.

"You wonder who I am, and at my strange and mysterious conduct. I cannot gratify your curiosity, though I would like very much to do so. The only excuse or apology I can offer for my requesting you to meet me here this evening, is this: I love you fervently, madly love you. My life will be like a desert if you do not return my love. Do you think you could ever love me? But how can I ask you to love me when you know me not? I must be mad?"

He spoke the last part with anguish in his voice, and such a beseeching and pleading look in his eyes, that I could not help telling him I loved him, and would trust him to the end of time.

"He caught me in his arms, and mur-

A PROTEST.

WE emphatically deny that we are the house that leaves goods exposed in our windows on Sundays, to the gaze of thousands that may pass up and down King street, in order to keep our business before the public, as they will not forget where to call on Monday. We believe that we can do business enough in six days to satisfy us, and rest on the seventh. Our belief is that there exists a law in this country to compel such places to shut up or cover their goods from the gaze of the people on Sundays. We say, with the right-thinking people, that they ought to be made to give an account for such proceedings. At all events, sooner or later, they will have to render an account at another tribunal, if they should escape the law of civilization. We don't believe in such proceedings, and we add our protest against it.

mured, "Heaven bless you, my trusting darling, and help me to prove worthy of you."

We talked for nearly an hour. I cannot remember half we said. But when we parted I had promised to meet him the next evening at the same hour and place.
I met him as agreed upon, and consented to elope with him the fourth morn'g after that. We made all necessary arrangements for our marriage at that time.
We were to go to a neighboring town and be married. After the ceremony, Alonzo —that was what he told me to call him—was to reveal his real name, and then we were to go to his home.

The three days following our last interview were miserable ones to me. I did not know but I should involve myself in trouble and misery by my hasty and secret marriage with a stranger; but I was determined to fulfil my promise, for I loved him, and my destiny was linked to his. My parents were dear to me, but I was willing to give up all for Alonzo.

The morning came that I was to leave my home, perhaps for ever. I rose very early and arrayed myself for my departure.
I then stole softly down stairs, out into the garden, where Alonzo was waiting.

"Oh, Alonzo," I said, "I am afraid I am doing wrong to leave my parents in this manner."

He stooped down and kissed my forehead, and asked me if I loved them more than I did him?

"Oh, no," I cried; "I love you better than life."

We got into the carriage in waiting, and drove towards the town where the ceremony was to be performed. Only two others besides the minister were present in the church. I felt faint as we walked up the aisle; but the strong arm of Alonzo supported me, and his voice gave me courage as he told me I had nothing to fear.

After the ceremony was over, Alonzo turned to me and said, "Now, my love, our kind friends will read some papers which will explain who and what I am."

One of the witnesses handed the clergyman a large roll of papers, which he deliberately unfolded and commenced to read the contents of one piece, when I felt myself becoming faint and dizzy from excitement and fear that something dreadful was going to be revealed. The church swam round, and the last I knew I was falling.

I opened my eyes and looked around.
I was lying on the floor in my own room; it was several minutes before I could comprehend how I came there; but at last I remembered my dream—for, after all, it was but a dream, and I was very thankful it was nothing more.

I had been reading an interesting book that evening, and when I finished it I sat down by my window, and was thinking how pleasant it would be to have an adventure like a novel heroine. I went to sleep thinking of it, and had my strange dream. I was quite provoked because I did not put off fainting until I had heard who my unknown lover was.
